Appellant contends that the court erred in certain rulings touching the admissibility of evidence. The prosecuting witness testified that while he was going up a pair of stairs leading from the street to the upper story of a house, he was cut by the appellant, who had followed him; that he (the witness) made an outcry, and immediately turned and pursued the appellant down the stairs, and that appellant was arrested a few steps from the foot of the stairs by a man named Riordan. There was testimony on the part of defendant to the point that it was a third man who fled down the stairs, that the third man ran away and escaped, and that the appellant, who was passing along the street, had merely stopped near the foot of the stairs at the time of his arrest, because attracted by the outcry of the prosecuting witness. Riordan testified that he delivered the man whom he had arrested to some officers, and also testified, without objection, that, while the officers were taking appellant to the receiving hospital, a pistol fell from the person of appellant, and, going off, shot appellant in the leg. One of the officers, against the objection of appellant, also swore to the dropping of the pistol, and the pistol was admitted in evidence against appellant's objection.

The appellant was a witness in his own behalf, and in his testimony in chief merely gave an account of how he happened to be near the stairway at the time of his arrest. His narrative stopped at the point of his arrest. He said nothing about anything that occurred afterwards, and made no allusion to the episode of the pistol, but on cross-examination the prosecution immediately commenced asking him about the pistol; the very first question being, "Did you ever see that pistol before?" To this appellant's counsel objected as "not in cross-examination," and also as irrelevant and immaterial, and "calculated to convict the defendant of another and different charge." The objection was overruled, and appellant excepted. The ruling was clearly erroneous. By section 1323 of the Penal Code a defendant who offers himself as a witness can be cross-examined only as to "matters about which he was examined in chief." As the cross-examination was not as to a matter about which appellant had been examined in chief, and as it was not admissible for the purpose of impeaching his character, (Code Civil Proc. § 2051,) we cannot conceive of any theory upon which it can be justified. See People v. O'Brien, 66 Cal. 602, 6 Pac. Rep. 695; People v. Bishop, 81 Cal. 116, 22 Pac. Rep. 477. The only plausible position that can be taken by respondent is that the matter inquired of in the cross-examination was not of sufficient importance to have been prejudicial to appellant. But, in the first place, the prosecution, after having persistently endeavored all through the trial to prove the fact that appellant had a pistol, can hardly be heard to say now that such fact was not important; and, in the second place, it is quite clear that evidence of the fact that appellant had a pistol, although he was only charged with having committed the crime with a knife, greatly prejudiced him in the minds of the jury. There is no escape, therefore, from the conclusion that for said error a new trial must be granted.

As to the other alleged errors in rulings on evidence, it is sufficient to say that no exceptions were taken at the proper time. The charge of the court to the jury is not upon its face erroneous. We do not think that the language of the charge prevented the jury from finding appellant guilty of a lesser crime included within the information, or apparently influenced them to find a verdict for the highest offense.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

KIESSIG v. ALLSPAUGH et al. (No. 19,134.)

CONTRACTORS' BONDS—ENFORCEMENT AGAINST SURETIES.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1183, provides that a building contract which is not recorded before work is commenced thereunder, when the contract price exceeds $1,000, shall be void, and no recovery thereon can be had by either party thereto. Held, that a bond for $5,000 given by the contractor to the owner to secure the latter against claims and liens for labor on materials, and which refers to a written contract that has not been recorded, made between the principal and obligee, is not within the meaning of the statute, and may be enforced without violating the above section. Kiessig v. Allspaugh, 27 Pac. Rep. 662, 91 Cal. 234, followed. Lumber Co. v. Neal, 27 Pac. Rep. 192, 90 Cal. 213, overruled; McFarland, J., holding that the cases are distinguishable.

2. The failure to record the contract did not increase the obligation of a surety on the bond.

Garoutte and Harrison, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by Kiessig against A. M. Allspaugh and M. S. Hall, as principals, and N. P. Lundeen, as surety, to recover on a building contractor's bond. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Lundeen appeals. Affirmed.

Parrish, Mossholder & Lewis, for appellant. Carl Schutze, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The plaintiff in this action seeks to recover $1,807.25 upon a building contractor's bond executed to him by the defendants Allspaugh and Hall as principals, and by the defendant Lundeen as surety. The bond sued upon was executed on October 15, 1887, and, after reciting the fact that the principals therein had upon October 14, 1887, entered into a contract with the plaintiff here to build for him a certain house, for the price and in accordance with the specifications contained in said contract, proceeds: "Now, therefore, we, A. M. Allspaugh and M. S. Hall, as principals, and H. V. Poser and N. P. Lundeen, as sureties, bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and successors, in the sum of $5,000, to forever save and hold harmless the said Charles Kiessig against any claims, demands, or liens of all characters whatsoever for material or labor expended or used in the building, constructing, and finishing of the said house." The original building contract was not recorded, and the price therein agreed to be paid for the construction of the building was $8,000. Work under the contract was commenced after the execution of the bond just referred to, and the building was completed by the contractors in accordance with the plans contained in the original contract, but plaintiff was compelled to pay in addition to the contract price the amount sued for in this action for the purpose of discharging the liens for materials used in and labor performed on the building. Judgment was rendered in the superior court in favor of plaintiff, and the defendant Lundeen appeals.

It is provided by section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure that all contracts for the construction of buildings, when the amount agreed to be paid therefor exceeds $1,000, shall be in writing, and filed in the office of the recorder of the county where the property is situated, before work is commenced under the contract; and, if not so filed with the recorder, "they shall be wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereunder by either party thereto." The section further provides that in such case the labor and materials of all persons except the contractor "shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." The appellant, Lundeen, claims that the bond sued upon in this action is dependent upon the contract referred to therein, and that, as this contract is wholly void under the provisions of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure just cited, because not filed with the county recorder, the bond is void also. The point thus presented was decided adversely to the contention of appellant in the case of Kiessig v. Allspaugh, 91 Cal. 234, 27 Pac. Rep. 662, in which the validity of this same bond was attacked by one of the principals named therein, upon the ground now urged by appellant. In answering this objection to its validity, the court there said: "Although the original contract could not be enforced, because not recorded, the contractor might nevertheless perform, and the plaintiff could accept such performance, and neither be guilty of any wrong in so doing; and if, in performing, the appellant incurred a personal liability for labor or materials, which was discharged by the plaintiff in order to remove a lien from his own property, or at the request of the appellant, the obligation to repay plaintiff is created by law, and would exist independently of the building contract, and is not affected by any defect therein, and is a sufficient consideration to support the express undertaking of defendant to repay, and the bond may therefore be deemed so far an independent undertaking that the right to enforce it does not depend upon the subsequent or continued validity of the building contract. As already stated, this bond is not within the letter of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and it may be added that it is not within its reason or spirit, and its enforcement is not in conflict with the policy of that section." The provision of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure making wholly void, as between the parties thereto, a written contract for the construction of a building for a price exceeding $1,000, unless the same is filed with the county recorder before the commencement of work thereunder, is an arbitrary one, and is not to be extended to any contract not falling strictly within its letter. It does not extend to a bond like that under consideration here, the very object of which is to provide for the payment of all those liens and claims which it is the chief object of the statute to secure.

Nor did the failure of plaintiff to record the building contract increase the obligation assumed by appellant as a surety for the principal obligors named in the bond. It is true that, if such contract had been filed, the liens upon the property of plaintiff could not have exceeded the contract price, and might have been discharged with the money which the plaintiff retained in his hands until the final settlement with the contractors, as provided for in the building contract. But the failure to file this contract with the recorder was not an omission to discharge any duty which the plaintiff owed to the defendant as a surety, and did not add to the obligation imposed upon him by the terms of the bond which he signed. Undoubtedly, the defendant might have stipulated in the bond that the building contract should be filed as a condition precedent to his liability as a surety; but he did not do so, and the court is not authorized to construe or interpolate such a condition into the bond, and in this respect to make a new contract for the parties who executed it. The bond was executed in view of the fact that the contractors were about to commence the erection of a house for plaintiff in accordance with the written contract mentioned in the bond, and the sole purpose of the bond was to protect the plaintiff against the consequences of a failure of the contractors to pay the personal obligations which they might incur for labor and materials, in the event that they actually constructed for him the building referred to in the contract; and it is the duty of the court to enforce it according to its terms. The case of Lumber Co. v. Neal, 90 Cal. 213, 27 Pac. Rep. 192, cited by appellant, does sustain his contention; but, upon a more careful consideration of the question therein decided, we are not satisfied with the conclusion reached in that case. Judgment and order affirmed.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment and in the opinion of Mr. Justice DE HAVEN, except that I think the case distinguishable from that of Lumber Co. v. Neal.

In re BLYTHE'S ESTATE. (No. 14,837.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1893.)

RES JUDICATA—PENDING RIGHT TO APPEAL.

Since, under Code Civil Proc. § 1049, by which an action is pending until the time for appeal has expired, or the judgment has been sooner satisfied, a judgment until then is not final, an unsatisfied decree, the time for an appeal from which has not expired, is no evidence of the facts thereby adjudged.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Petition, in the matter of the estate of Thomas H. Blythe, deceased, for a family allowance to Florence Blythe. Appeal from an order granting the same. Reversed.

H. S. Brown, John R. Jarboe, W. S. Goodfellow, and Edward R. Taylor, for appellants. W. H. H. Hart, Garber, Boalt & Bishop, Thos. I. Bergin, and W. W. Foote, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This appeal is prosecuted from an order granting a family allowance to Florence Blythe. Upon the hearing of the petition for the allowance, counsel for the applicant introduced in evidence the findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the decree heretofore made and entered in the action of Blythe v. Ayers et al., wherein it is found and adjudged that Florence Blythe is the lawful child and heir of Thomas H. Blythe, deceased. The petitioner, aside from certain matters pertaining to property, rested her application upon the foregoing evidence. Appellants thereupon requested the court to grant a continuance for such reasonable time as would enable them to perfect an appeal to the supreme court from the judgment in Blythe v. Ayers, and stated that they intended in good faith to appeal from such judgment, and also asked for a continuance for the purpose of introducing testimony to prove that the petitioner was not, in fact, the child of said Thomas H. Blythe, deceased, or a member of his family. These motions being denied, appellants then moved the court to deny the prayer of said petitioner, upon the grounds that no evidence had been introduced that she was the child of said Thomas H. Blythe, deceased, or a member of his family, other than the findings, etc., (to which reference has already been made,) and that said findings of fact, conclusions of law, and decree show that petitioner never was the adopted child of Blythe, the deceased. This motion was denied, and the family allowance ordered.

We do not find it necessary to consider the claims of counsel that the court abused its discretion in not granting appellants a reasonable continuance for the purposes stated, as the decree must be reversed upon other grounds. Neither do we deem the contention of appellants sound wherein it is insisted that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order of allowance, because the petitioner's status as the child of Blythe was denied. That was a question of fact for the court to determine before denying or granting the application, and in no sense jurisdictional. The decree must be reversed because there is no evidence to support it. Appellants were present at the hearing of the application, and denied the allegation of the petition that Florence Blythe was the child and heir at law of Blythe, deceased. To prove that fact, findings, conclusions of law, and decree in the case of Blythe v. Ayers were introduced in evidence. We think them wholly insufficient to prove it. The findings and decree in that action were filed and entered October 22, 1890. The application for an allowance was filed and heard October 31, 1890. The judgment was but nine days old when offered in evidence, and, under the statute, the losing parties were entitled to an appeal from it at any time within 60 days from its rendition. By virtue of section 1049 of the Code of Civil Procedure, an action is pending until the time for appeal has expired, or the judgment sooner satisfied. This judgment, being but nine days old at the date of the hearing, and not satisfied, afforded no evidence of the facts therein found, for it was not a final judgment, inasmuch as the action was still pending. A judgment, in order to be admissible in evidence for the purpose of proving facts therein recited, must be a final judgment in the cause; and, if the action in which the judgment is rendered is still pending, necessarily the judgment is not final. As was said in Hills v. Sherwood, 33 Cal. 478: "Although a judgment may be final with reference to the court which pronounced it, and as such be the subject of appeal, yet it is not necessarily final with reference to the property or rights affected so long as it is subject to appeal, and liable to be reversed." The sound policy of a law which will not allow a decree to stand upon such evidence is well illustrated by the Blythe litigation. This judgment, which was introduced in evidence upon the hearing of the matter of family allowance to prove the paternity of the child, has since been attacked by appeal, and the matter is now pending in this court. Let us assume that the judgment will be reversed upon the findings, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for appellants; by such assumption the judgment upon which the decree of family allowance was based has gone forever. It has not only disappeared, but the evidence of the paternity of the child upon which the allowance was granted is declared by the court of last resort to be no evidence of such paternity. If this judgment was evidence of the fact of paternity, it was conclusive evidence of that fact,—it was res adjudicata. Yet that cannot be possible, for nothing is res adjudicata until it has reached final judgment. As was said in Webb v. Buckelew, 82 N. Y. 560: "It is therefore only a final judgment upon the merits which prevents further contest upon the same issue, and becomes evidence in another action, between the same parties or their privies. Until final judgment is reached, the proceedings are subject to change and modification, are imperfect and inchoate, and can avail nothing as a bar or as evidence, until the judgment, with its verity as a record, settles finally and conclusively the question at issue." And, again: "Whenever it fails to fix and determine the ultimate rights of the parties, wherever it leaves room for a final decision yet to be made, it is not admissible in another action, for the plain reason that it has finally decided and settled nothing. Until the judgment comes, no man can know what the ultimate decision will be." In Harris v. Barnhart, (Cal.; decision filed March 18, 1893,) 32 Pac. Rep. 589, it is decided that a judgment cannot be pleaded in bar where it has not been satisfied and the time for appeal has not expired. In other words, the judgment is not a final judgment if the action is still pending, and the plea should be in abatement. In Naftzger v. Gregg, (Cal.; decision filed July 21, 1893,) 33 Pac. Rep. 757, the doctrine is again declared, some of the justices holding that "when, upon the submission of the case, it appeared to the court that a year had not elapsed since the entry of the judgment, and no other evidence upon that issue had been introduced, the court should have held that it did not constitute a bar, for the reason that under the provisions of section 1049, Code Civil Proc., the action was deemed to be still pending." Other members of the court went to greater lengths, and declared the judgment inadmissible as evidence for any purpose. For the foregoing reasons we conclude the evidence is wholly insufficient to support the order. Let the order be reversed.

VON SCHMIDT v. WIDBER, Treasurer.
(No. 15,160.)

COURTS—PRACTICE—ORDERS.

1. Under the present constitution, whenever a judge of the superior court is present at the place designated for the transaction of judicial business, and there assumes to transact such business, his acts are the acts of the "court;" and therefore an order dispensing with an undertaking on an appeal, made and signed by a judge of the superior court of San Francisco county while holding a session of one of the departments of the court at its court room, is a sufficient compliance with Code Civil Proc. § 946, providing that the "court" below may dispense with an undertaking on appeal in certain cases.

2. Since there is no provision requiring orders of the superior court to be entered at length on its minutes, it is sufficient if an order dispensing with an undertaking on appeal be filed with the clerk.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by one Von Schmidt against one Widber, treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. Respondent moves to dismiss. Denied.

Harry T. Creswell, for appellant. Tilden & Tilden, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Motion to dismiss the appeal. The appellant was sued in his official capacity, as treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, and has appealed from the judgment against him. Section 946, Code Civil Proc., provides that the court below may, in its discretion, dispense with an undertaking on appeal "when the appellant is an executor, administrator, trustee, or other person acting in another's right;" and in Scheerer v. Edgar, 67 Cal. 377, 7 Pac. Rep. 760, it was held that this section applied to an action against a municipal officer in his official capacity. On the 19th of July, 1892, after the defendant had given his notice of appeal, the Honorable James M. Troutt, one of the judges of said superior court, and the presiding judge thereof, while holding a session of one of the departments of the court at its court room, and engaged in the trial of a cause then pending in said department, upon the motion of the attorney for the defendant, made and signed an order dispensing with any undertaking upon said appeal, which he returned to said attorney, and it was on the same day filed with the clerk, but no record thereof was ever made in the minutes of the court. The respondent now moves to dismiss the appeal for the want of an undertaking, upon the ground that an order dispensing with an undertaking on appeal can be made only by the court, whereas the foregoing order was made by a judge, and not by the court.

A court is a tribunal presided over by one or more judges, for the exercise of such judicial power as has been conferred upon it by law. Blackstone, following Coke, defines it as "a place where justice is judicially administered," (3 Bl. Comm. 23;) but it is also essential that this place be designated by law, and that the person or persons who are authorized to administer justice be at that place for the purpose of administering justice at such times as may be also designated by law. The times fixed by law for the transaction of judicial business are called "terms," and the periods between the end of one term and the beginning of the next are called "vacations." These "terms" vary in different jurisdictions according to the statutes by which they are fixed; in some states ending at fixed dates, and in others continuing until the commencement of a succeeding term. Formerly, in England, there were four terms of court in each year, and their duration was so fixed that there were only 91 days in each year during which the courts could be in session. As the judicial business increased, it became impossible to transact it all within these periods of time, and there grew up the practice of hearing many matters "out of court" with the same effect as if heard while the court was in session; but the matters which were thus heard were only such as pertained to causes pending in court, and which were of a nature to expedite or facilitate the judicial disposition of the pending cause, to which they were merely subsidiary or collateral. At a later day the practice arose of hearing and disposing of such matters at certain hours during "term time" while the court was not in formal session, and subsequently certain hours of each day were fixed, at which one of the judges would hear these matters while the court was actually in session. The motions and orders thus made were said to be heard and disposed of "at chambers," for the reason that they were heard by the judge at his chambers, rather than in the court room, but the term "chambers" finally became extended so as to include any place, either in or out of the court room, at which a judge may hear applications or make orders while the court is not in session, in matters pending in that court. The distinction between those matters which could be heard in court and those which could be heard at chambers arose from convenience, rather than from any other cause, but they were limited to the subsidiary and incidental steps in practice and procedure, leaving to the court the judicial determination of the issues presented by the pleadings, and which formed a part of the record. The term "court," as used in the Code of Civil Procedure, means sometimes the place where the court is held, sometimes the tribunal itself, and sometimes the individual presiding over the tribunal, and in many cases is used synonymously, as well as interchangeably, with "judge;" and whether the act is to be performed by the one or the other is generally to be determined by the character of the act, rather than by such designation. Section 166 provides that a judge "may, at chambers, grant all orders and writs which are usually granted in the first instance upon an ex parte application;" and section 1004 provides that orders made out of court may be made by the judge of the court in any part of the state. Prior to the adoption of the present constitution there were fixed terms in this state for the transaction of judicial business by the several district courts, and any act done by a court after its term had ended was void. Bates v. Gage, 40 Cal. 183. Upon the adoption of the present constitution, all terms of court were abolished, and by its provisions (article 6, § 5) the superior courts are always open, and (section 6) in San Francisco there may be as many sessions of said court at the same time as there are judges thereof; and "the judgments, orders and proceedings of any session of the superior court, held by any one or more of the judges of said courts respectively, shall be equally effectual as if all the judges of said respective courts presided at such session." Under the present constitution of this state, therefore, whenever a judge of the superior court is present at the place designated for the transaction of judicial business, and there assumes to transact such business, his acts may be considered as the acts of the court of which he is a judge.

There is no provision, either in the constitution or by statute, which requires the presence of any other officer than the judge to constitute a court, or to authorize the transaction of judicial business, nor is there any provision of law which requires all the orders of a court to be entered at length in its minutes in order that they may be effective; and by section 1003, Code Civil Proc., every direction of a court or judge is an order, whether it be merely made in writing or entered in the minutes. If it is not entered it should, however, be filed, in order that it may form a part of the records in the case. The county clerk is ex officio the clerk of the superior court of his county, and his duties are fixed by statute, and are defined in section 111 of the county government act, (St. 1891, p. 322.) This statute, however, is intended to define his duties as a political officer of the state, rather than to prescribe or limit the functions or judicial powers of the court. He is not, however, by this act, required to do more than to "enter a synopsis of all orders, judgments and decrees proper to be entered, unless the court shall order them to be entered at length." By section 1052, Code Civil Proc., he is required to keep a register of actions in which he must enter the title of the action, "with brief notes under it from time to time of all papers filed and proceedings had therein." He is also required to make in the minutes of the court an entry of certain acts and transactions had or done in the presence of the court by the parties to an action, such as their oral consent to a waiver of a trial by jury, (section 631,) or of findings of fact, (section 634,) or their agreement to a reference, (section 638;) and, in case of receiving a verdict upon the trial of a cause by a jury, he is to make an entry of the time of trial, the names of the jurors and witnesses, and to set out the verdict at length, (section 628.) These, however, are matters which form a proper connection between the pleadings and the judgment, and, as they are a digression in the progress of a trial from the general course of procedure designated for obtaining a judgment upon the issues presented by the pleadings, the legislature has deemed it proper that they should be evidenced by a permanent memorandum thereof. But these entries in the minutes are evidently intended for the guidance of the court in its further action in the cause, and cease to be of value upon the entry of the judgment, for they form no part of the judgment roll, or "record" of the judicial action of the court, (section 670,) and cannot be used to impeach that record. With the exception of orders in matters of probate, (section 1704,) there is no provision in the Code of Civil Procedure which requires the clerk to enter in his minutes any order of the court made during the trial of the cause, or at any time after issue and before judgment. The final action of the court upon the issue made by the pleadings, and which is a judicial determination of that issue, is to be recorded by the clerk in the judgment book. Section 668. It is essential, however, that the action of the court be made a matter of record, in order that there may be no uncertainty as to what its action has been, and for this purpose it is customary, as well as expedient, to have its acts entered in the minutes kept by the clerk; but if the order is formally prepared and signed by the judge, and made a matter of record by filing with the clerk, the same end is attained as if it were spread at length upon the minutes of its daily transactions. As was said in Niles v. Edwards, 95 Cal. 47, 30 Pac. Rep. 134: "The action of the court does not depend upon the entry of its orders by the clerk, but upon the fact that the orders have been made; and, whenever it is shown that an order has been made by the court, it is as effective as if it had been entered of record by the clerk." We hold, therefore, that, as the order in question was made by a judge, who at the time was at the place designated for holding court, and in the exercise of his judicial functions as a court, it was a sufficient compliance with the provisions of section 946, and the motion to dismiss the appeal is therefore denied.

PALMTAG v. ROADHOUSE et al. (No. 15,018.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1893.)

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS — ESTOPPEL TO PLEAD — DEMURRER.

1. The fact that a mortgagor was the general attorney of the mortgagee in other matters does not make the position of the mortgagor a fiduciary one, or render it anything but adverse to the mortgagor's interest, as far as the mortgage is concerned, so as to estop him to set up the statute of limitations to an action of foreclosure.

2. Under the California practice, when all the facts that defendant would be required to prove to sustain his plea of the statute of limitations appear on the face of the complaint, defendant may take advantage thereof by demurrer; but, to uphold a demurrer, the complaint must show, not that the cause of action may be barred, but that it is barred.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county.

Action by Frederika Palmtag against George W. Roadhouse and Emma Roadhouse, his wife, to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

James Hall and Cross & Hall, for appellant. S. F. Geil and John J. Wyatt, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is an action brought to foreclose a mortgage given by the defendants, George W. Roadhouse and wife, to secure a promissory note for $1,550 and interest, made by said defendants, Roadhouse and wife. The note and mortgage were dated March 25, 1885, and the note was payable to Frederika Palmtag, or order, one year after date. The action was commenced July 9, 1890,—as may be seen, more than four years after the maturity of the note. Defendants demurred to the complaint upon the ground, among others, that the cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California. Plaintiff, in her complaint, and with an evident view to avoid the apparent bar of the statute of four years, inserted in her complaint the following statement: "That said defendant George W. Roadhouse is an attorney and counselor at law, and engaged in the practice of law at Salinas City, Monterey county, Cal., and that plaintiff is a widow woman, residing at Watsonville, Santa Cruz county, Cal., and that the facts set forth in this paragraph have existed for several years last past. That, for about five years last past, said defendant George W. Roadhouse has been acting as the attorney and confidential agent for this plaintiff, and plaintiff always had full faith in his honesty and uprightness, and placed implicit confidence in his declarations and advice to her. That at various and sundry times between March 25, 1886, and March 25, 1890, defendant George W. Roadhouse told plaintiff and wrote to plaintiff that she need not trouble herself about that note and mortgage, (meaning the note and mortgage set out in this complaint;) that he would pay it before it outlawed, or words to that effect; and various and sundry other statements of like import, all of which statements plaintiff fully believed and relied upon. That plaintiff is a woman not conversant with business affairs and matters, and relied implicitly on the aforesaid assertions of her agent and attorney. That defendant George W. Roadhouse was at all times herein mentioned the husband and agent of defendant Emma Roadhouse, and acted in that capacity in all matters pertaining to said note and mortgage. That said defendant Emma Roadhouse, as plaintiff is informed and believes, and therefore alleges, well knew each and every fact set out in this paragraph before March 25, 1890, and agreed thereto and acquiesced therein." The demurrer was sustained by the court, and, plaintiff declining to amend, final judgment was entered in favor of defendants, from which judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The doctrine of estoppel, invoked by appellant against the defendants, cannot be maintained. It is not made to appear that George W. Roadhouse occupied any fiduciary relation to plaintiff in the matter of the note and mortgage. His position as to that transaction was adverse to the plaintiff, and the fact that he was her attorney in other matters did not alter his status in this respect; at least, it cannot be presumed to have done so, in the absence of express averments on the subject.

2. The complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause for action, and the demurrer was evidently sustained upon the theory that plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure, (statute limiting actions to four years.) The attempted averment of facts in avoidance of the statute is not explicit and clear, and the complaint would have been open, perhaps, to a demurrer upon the ground that the complaint was ambiguous, unintelligible, or uncertain; but a demurrer to a cause of action, upon the ground that it is barred by the statute of limitations, can only be sustained where the pleading shows it clearly open to the objection. To uphold a demurrer for this cause, the complaint should show, not that the cause of action may be barred, but that it is barred. Where, from the pleading, the question is left in doubt, an answer setting up the plea should be resorted to. Farris v. Merritt, 63 Cal. 118; Harmon v. Page, 62 Cal. 448; Smith v. Richmond, 19 Cal. 477; Barringer v. Warden, 12 Cal. 311. At common law the statute of limitations can only be interposed by plea, and could not be urged upon demurrer to the declaration, although apparent upon its face. In equity the rule was that, if all the facts which a defendant would be required to prove to sustain his plea appeared upon the face of the complaint, the defendant might take advantage of it by demurrer. We have substantially adopted the equitable mode of pleading, and with it the practice of permitting the statute of limitations to be interposed by way of demurrer in a proper case. In the present case I am of the opinion that, admitting all the facts of the complaint to be true, including those defectively pleaded, but not objected to, defendants were not entitled to judgment upon the ground that the plaintiff's complaint showed her demand to be barred by the statute of limitations. It follows that the judgment of the court below should be reversed, and the court directed to overrule the demurrer to the complaint, with leave to defendants to answer.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the court below is reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the complaint, and with leave to defendants to answer.

DUNCAN v. GRADY et al. (No. 15,471.)

APPEAL—TAKING FOR DELAY—DAMAGES.

When it appears by the uncontradicted affidavit of respondent, on an appeal from a money judgment, that the appeal was taken merely for delay, and that there was no pretense of any defense, the court, on dismissing the appeal for failure to file a transcript, will award respondent damages for appellant's abuse of the right of appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county.

Action by one Duncan against W. D. Grady and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Dismissed.

W. D. Grady, for appellants. J. P. Strother, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal because of the failure of de-defendants to file a transcript within the time prescribed by rule 2 of this court, and for damages. The appeal is from a judgment rendered against defendants for the sum of $1,233.35, and was perfected by the filing of an undertaking on appeal on June 24, 1893, and no transcript on appeal has been filed in this court; and it further appears from the certificate of the clerk of the superior court, dated August 23, 1893, that the defendants have not requested him to certify to any copy of the record. Upon these facts, the appeal must be dismissed. At the time of giving notice of the motion to dismiss the appeal, the respondent also gave notice that he would ask for damages upon the ground that the appeal was taken only for delay. This notice was based upon an affidavit of respondent, a copy of which was duly served upon appellants. This affidavit of respondent states that after the rendition of the judgment appealed from "execution was duly issued in his favor for the levy and collection of the amount due by said judgment, and, after a levy by the sheriff upon sufficient property of defendants to have satisfied said judgment, defendant W. D. Grady, who was also the attorney for himself and the other defendants, C. A. Owen and R. T. Owen, proposed to this affiant to give a chattel mortgage to gain further time upon said debt; that he referred him to his (affiant's) attorney, and that said Grady told this affiant, if he did not consent to said proposition, that they would take an appeal upon the judgment, and keep him out of the money for a year, and that he (affiant) would only get seven per cent. interest upon the debt; that none of the defendants ever pretended to have any defense to the action, nor any offset to the debt or judgment; and that the only purpose of appeal in this case was for delay." This affidavit is not contradicted, and, for the purposes of this motion, the matters therein stated must be taken as confessed by the defendants. The facts stated in the affidavit are such as to entitle the respondent to a judgment against defendants for damages. Buckley v. Stebbins, 2 Cal. 149. Ordinarily, the rate of interest allowed by law upon a judgment will be deemed a sufficient compensation to the judgment creditor for any delay occasioned by an appeal, and the mere fact that, in the opinion of this court, an appeal is ill advised, will not justify the imposition of damages; but when it appears, as in this case, that there has been an abuse of the right of appeal, and an attempt to wrest the law in relation thereto from its true object, and to use it for a purpose for which it was never designed, damages will be awarded. Appeal dismissed, and judgment in favor of respondent and against appellants for the sum of $100, damages and costs.

ABSOLUTE DEED AS MORTGAGE — RECORD ON APPEAL.

1. Where a purchaser of land verbally agrees with another that, if the latter will loan him the purchase price, the conveyance shall be made direct to the latter as security therefor and also for future advances, the conveyance makes the lender a trustee and also a mortgagee, and he has a lien for the amount advanced for the purchase and for the subsequent advances.

2. In order to obtain a review of a ruling on the refusal of the court to allow amendment of pleadings, the request and ruling must be incorporated in the statement, or brought up by bill of exceptions.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by Campbell against Freeman, administrator of A. G. Anderson, deceased, to have a conveyance declared a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank H. Short and G. C. Freeman, for appellant. Gayle & Coldwell, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. In April, 1882, A. G. Anderson, the appellant's intestate, being about to purchase a tract of land, made a verbal agreement with the plaintiff that the plaintiff should loan him $800 with which to make the purchase, and that the conveyance should be made by the vendor directly to the plaintiff, who should hold the title as security for the money so loaned, and also for all other moneys which he should thereafter loan to or advance for him, and that Anderson should take possession of the property so conveyed. In pursuance of this agreement the conveyance was made to the plaintiff, and the purchase money therefor was paid by the plaintiff to the vendor, and Anderson entered into the possession of the property, and remained in possession thereof until his death in 1889, making valuable improvements thereon. After the purchase the plaintiff loaned other sums of money to Anderson, and made payments on his account, in pursuance of the aforesaid agreement, amounting to $2,419, for which, on the 6th day of June, 1889, he executed to the plaintiff his promissory note. After this date the plaintiff made still other payments for the account of Anderson, under the said agreement, and after his death presented to his administrator a claim against his estate, properly verified, for all of the aforesaid amounts, amounting to $3,116.50, which was allowed and afterwards approved by the judge of the superior court, and filed with the clerk. The plaintiff brought this action against the administrator, alleging the agreement between himself and Anderson, and that by virtue thereof the land that had been conveyed to him was held in mortgage to secure the payment of the said indebtedness, and asking for the sale thereof, and payment of the said claim out of the proceeds thereof. Judgment was rendered in his favor, from which the defendant has appealed; claiming that the only effect of the transaction and agreement between the plaintiff and Anderson was to create a resulting trust in favor of Anderson, by which the plaintiff held the land as security for only the amount advanced for its purchase.

The rule is familiar that when, upon a purchase of real property, the purchase money is paid by one person, and the conveyance is made to another, a resulting trust immediately arises against the person to whom the land is conveyed, in favor of the one by whom the purchase money is paid. The real purchaser of the property is considered as the owner, with the right to control the title in the hands of the grantee, and to demand a conveyance from him at any time. The same rule prevails if the money paid by the party taking the title is advanced by him as a loan to the other, and the conveyance is made to the lender for the purpose of securing the loan; but in the latter case the purchaser cannot demand the conveyance until he has paid the money advanced, and for which the land is held as security. In such a case the grantee holds a double relation to the real purchaser,—he is his trustee of the legal title to the land, and his mortgagee for the money advanced for its purchase, and, as in the case of any other mortgage which is evidenced by an absolute deed, is entitled to retain the title until the payment of the claim for which it is held as security; and he may also enforce his lien by an action of foreclosure. The conveyance is none the less a mortgage because it was conveyed to him directly by a third party, to secure his loan to the purchaser for the amount of the purchase money, than if the conveyance had been made directly to the purchaser in the first instance, and the purchaser had then made a conveyance to him, as a security for the money that he had previously borrowed with which to make the purchase. He is regarded as holding the land in trust for the protection of the purchaser; but this rule is not to be so extended as to enable the purchaser to work him an injury. Equity looks beyond the forms of a transaction, and shapes its judgments in such a way as to carry out the purposes of the parties to the agreement, and to protect each of them against any unconscionable advantage to be derived from the apparent form in which their transaction has taken place. In the present case the title to the land which the plaintiff took from the grantor was held by him in trust for Anderson. This was a trust created by operation of law; but, contemporaneously with the creation of this trust, there was impressed upon the title, by virtue of the agreement between Anderson and the plaintiff, a lien in favor of the plaintiff for the money which he had loaned him with which to make the purchase, and also for such other moneys as he should afterwards loan or advance to him. It was competent for them to make such an agreement, and the agreement, when made, had the effect to render the conveyance to the plaintiff a mortgage to secure the loans advanced to Anderson. "Any interest in property which is capable of being transferred may be mortgaged," (Civil Code, § 2947;) and if the transfer is made as security for the performance of an obligation, it is, in equity, a mortgage, irrespective of the form in which it is made. A deed absolute in form may be given as a security for future advances, without any accompanying obligation in writing, on the part of the person giving the deed. Husheon v. Husheon, 71 Cal. 412, 12 Pac. Rep. 410.

We cannot consider the refusal of the court to allow the defendant to amend his answer. The statement on motion for a new trial does not show that he made such request, nor does it show any ruling of the court in reference thereto, and there is no bill of exceptions containing any action of the court thereon. The only mode in which it is brought to our attention is by certain documents printed with the transcript, but which do not purport to be authenticated, except by the affidavit of his attorney. If a review of this ruling had been desired, it should have been either incorporated into the statement, or brought here by a bill of exceptions.

The objection to the allowance of an attorney's fee is not well taken. The note contained an express provision for its payment, and the issue made by the answer of the defendant was limited to the amount for which it could be allowed. It appears from the statement that the evidence justified the finding by the court that this amount was reasonable.

The conclusion that we have reached makes it unnecessary to consider the motion to dismiss the appeal. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

COLE v. WILCOX. (No. 19,168.)

APPEAL—NEW TRIAL—APPLICATION—EXCUSABLE NEGLIGENCE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

1. The determination of whether the failure of a party to procure additional time to prepare a statement on which to apply for a new trial was the result of excusable neglect or mistake is within the discretion of the trial court, and its findings are conclusive.

2. The objection that the statement of the case prepared for settlement on which to move for a new trial, and the proofs in support of the objection, should be made when the proposed statement is presented for settlement by the court, rather than at the hearing of the motion.

3. Granting a new trial because the judgment is not supported by the evidence being within the discretion of the trial court, in the absence of an abuse of that discretion the order will not be disturbed on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by one Cole against one Wilcox, executor. Defendant had judgment, and from an order granting a new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Wells, Monroe & Lee and Albert M. Stephens, for appellant. A. W. Blair and W. Cole, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought to recover damages for the alleged diversion of water from a canyon onto the plaintiff's land, through an artificial channel constructed by the defendant's testator. The cause was tried by a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of the defendant. A motion of the plaintiff for a new trial, upon the ground, among others, that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, was granted by the court, and from this order the defendant has appealed. The plaintiff gave notice of his intention to move for a new trial March 17, 1892, and on the 21st day of March obtained from the court 10 days' time, in addition to the time allowed by law, in which to prepare and serve his proposed statement of the case. On the 29th of March he went to the court for the purpose of procuring additional time in which to prepare the statement, and the application which he made was granted, but the order that was entered by the clerk was for a stay of execution, instead of giving him further time to prepare his statement, and he did not discover this fact until about April 4th, on which day he gave notice that he would make an application to the court for further time; and on the 11th day of April, in pursuance of this application, the court made an order reciting that "it appearing to the court that, through mistake and inadvertence, the plaintiff, upon the 29th day of March, 1892, applied to this court to procure an order for a stay of execution herein for ten days from that date; that it was his intention, when he came into court, to make an application to the court for ten days' time to prepare, serve, and file affidavits and statement on motion for a new trial; and that he supposed that he had made such application, and that such order had been granted, and so informed his counsel; and that, through said mistake, the time for filing said statement was by him permitted to expire, the same mistake not having been discovered until after said expiration,—it is therefore ordered that the plaintiff be, and is hereby, relieved from said mistake and inadvertence, and is given two days from this date, thirteen days from the 31st day of March, 1892, to prepare and serve and file the said statement."

1. If the failure of the plaintiff to procure the additional time was the result of an excusable neglect or mistake, the court had the power to relieve him from the effect thereof, (Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 33, 29 Pac. Rep. 332;) and whether it was the result of such mistake or excusable neglect was to be determined, in the exercise of its discretion, by the court to which the application was made. The facts stated in the order must be accepted by us as having been fully shown to the court by competent evidence, and upon these facts it must be conceded that the court acted in the exercise of a wise discretion in making the order.

2. When the motion for a new trial came on for hearing, the defendant objected to the court hearing the same, upon the ground that the statement of the case proposed for settlement by the court was not served upon him by the plaintiff within the time allowed by law, and that the court had lost jurisdiction to settle any statement in the case, and now urges that for this reason the court erred in granting a new trial. The correctness of the court's action in granting the new trial must be determined upon the record, on which it acted upon the hearing of that motion, and is not affected by any error which it may have committed in matters not connected with such action. The judge had settled and allowed the statement prior to this time, and had recited therein that it was "duly prepared and settled within due time and in the manner required by law;" and, also, that the "defendant objected to settlement of statement, upon the ground that the same was not served in time." If there were any reasons in support of this objection on the part of the defendant, the proper practice would have been to present them at that time, so that the judge could pass upon their sufficiency, and to have the objections, with the rulings of the judge thereon and any exception thereto, incorporated into the statement. A mere objection to the settlement of the statement, without pointing out the basis or the grounds of the objection, or presenting the facts upon which it was made, was not fair to either the judge or the opposite party; and, even if an exception had been taken to the ruling of the judge upon such objection, the party taking the exception would not have the right to its consideration upon appeal. When the motion for a new trial came on to be heard, the court, in its action thereon, was limited to considering the matters contained in the statement, and was not at liberty to go outside of the statement for the purpose of determining whether the new trial should be granted or refused.

3. The action of the trial court in granting a new trial, for the reason that the former verdict or decision was not supported by the evidence, is so much a matter of discretion that, unless it appears that there was an abuse of that discretion, this court will not interfere with its action. Although in the present case the plaintiff may have shown himself entitled only to nominal damages, yet a verdict for or against him would be decisive of a right which may be available in future litigation. The order is affirmed.

ASSAULT AND BATTERY—REMOVING TRESPASSER—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action for assault by one who was trespassing when assaulted, plaintiff testified that defendant said to him, "You get out of here, or I will pound your head with a hammer." The jury was instructed that, "before defendant would have been authorized to use force to remove plaintiff, * * * he should have requested plaintiff to depart." Held, that the instruction was misleading, as it gave the jury to understand that the language used by defendant did not constitute a "request" to leave.

2. Defendant removed plaintiff from his shop as a trespasser for injuriously handling the machines, and, in an action for the assault, the jury was instructed that "if * * * plaintiff, at the time of the injury complained of, was not trying to injure defendant or his property, then any force used against plaintiff * * * was wrongful." Held error, as it was immaterial that plaintiff was not handling the machines at the moment the force was used.

3. In an action for personal injuries, plaintiff having adduced mortuary tables to prove his probable expectation of life, excluding evidence of his habits as to sobriety is error.

Action for personal injuries by Charles Townsend against J. S. Briggs. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Brousseau & Thomas and Blackstock & Shepherd, for appellant. Barnes & Selby and H. L. Poplin, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. After a consideration of this case upon a hearing in bank, we are satisfied that the judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial should be reversed. This action is to recover damages for personal injuries caused by an alleged wrongful and malicious assault made by defendant upon the person of plaintiff. The jury rendered a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $9,000, upon which judgment was entered, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. The main question in the case was whether the appellant used unnecessary force in expelling the respondent from a building in the possession of appellant; and we think that certain instructions of the court to the jury were misleading and prejudicial to appellant.

The undisputed facts are these: Appellant and his partner, Leach, were in the rightful and peaceable possession of a small workshop, in which they were engaged in making and experimenting with certain machines for pitting fruits. Respondent entered the shop at a time when appellant was in an adjoining rear room, and, after speaking to a young man in the shop, immediately commenced in a rude and wrongful manner to handle two of said machines with great force, and to whirl the wheels thereof, and to operate said machines with great violence, so as to put them in great danger of being destroyed or broken. The noise of the whirling wheels attracted the attention of appellant, who came into the shop, and in a peremptory manner ordered respondent to let the machines alone, and to leave the premises. Respondent replied that he had left the machines alone, but did not proceed to leave the shop. As to the details of what then immediately occurred there is some conflict of testimony; but appellant, with an oath, told respondent that if he did not leave he would pound him on the head, and respondent replied with an oath that he would like to see him pound him on the head; and appellant then picked up a mallet, and struck respondent on the head. Respondent was staggered by the blow, but rallied, and advanced towards appellant, who struck him once or twice more. Respondent, either from the effect of one of the blows, or from slipping on fruit pits and skins on the floor, fell on the knife of one of the machines, and was thereby seriously injured. Respondent was at the time about 47 or 48 years old, weighed 170 pounds, and was apparently in good health. He testified that after the first blow he was dazed, and did not realize what afterwards happened. The appellant was over 60 years old, weighed 128 pounds, was in bad health, and subject to hemorrhages of the lungs. He testified that he was nervous and excitable; that respondent was "fighting drunk;" that he thought respondent wanted to fight, and, as he (appellant) was too old to fight respondent with his fists, he thought he would pick up something that he could defend himself with.

Whether or not the business and shop of appellant were of such a character as to carry an implied invitation to the public to enter the shop for business purposes need not be determined, for it is clear that respondent did not enter for any purpose of business. He was clearly a trespasser, at least from the moment he commenced to unlawfully and violently manipulate the said machines. The case, then, is within the rule that a man's house is his castle, and that he has the right to defend it against an intruder with all the force reasonably necessary to the defense. Of course, in such a case, a man would be liable for the result of a brutal use of force clearly beyond what the occasion warranted; but, in determining such a question, due allowance should always be made for the difficulty which a reasonable man would have in measuring, under exciting circumstances, the exact amount of force necessary; and it is extremely important that a jury, in passing upon such a case, should not in any way be misled by an instruction of the court.

We think that the jury were misled by instructions 4 and 5 given at request of plaintiff. In instruction 5 the court told the jury that, "before the defendant would have been authorized to use force to remove plaintiff from his place of business, he should have requested plaintiff to depart, and then," etc. Now, this instruction either assumes that the evidence left some doubt as to whether appellant told respondent to leave before any force was used; or else the jury were given the impression that there should have been a "request" couched in some polite and mild-mannered language different from that used by appellant. But there was no conflict at all in the evidence on the point. Respondent himself testified as follows: "While I was in there, Mr. Briggs came in, and ordered me out of the shop;" and then, after some conversation, "he said, 'You get out of here, or I will pound your head with a hammer,' or something of that sort." The jury, therefore, may well have thought that the language used by appellant did not constitute a "request," within the meaning of the said instruction; and it is difficult to perceive what other meaning they could have attached to it; and, indeed, the respondent seems to insist that he was not called upon to leave because appellant had not requested him in gentler tones to do so. But, whatever might be thought of appellant's language in a school of politeness, it was sufficient in a court of law if it plainly told respondent to go.

We think, also, that instruction 4 was erroneous and misleading. By that instruction the jury were told that "if the jury finds from the evidence that the plaintiff, at the time of the injury complained of, was not trying to injure the defendant, or his property, then any force used against plaintiff * * * was wrongful." From this instruction the jury might well get the impression that if, when the force was used, the respondent was not, at that very moment, engaged in the act of injuring appellant's property, that appellant had no right to use force, and such impression would have been a wrong one. When respondent went into the room, and commenced endangering appellant's property, as above stated, he became a trespasser, and appellant had a right to put him out, and to use sufficient force to do so; and the fact that, at the moment when the force was used, respondent was not then handling the machines, was of no consequence.

We think, also, that the court erred in a ruling upon the admissibility of evidence in a matter affecting the amount of damages. The respondent introduced as evidence tending to prove the probable future duration of his life certain mortuary tables, which, under the authorities, were admissible for that purpose. The witness who identified the tables was asked by appellant the question, "Can you tell what insurable persons are?" and the objection by respondent that it was not in cross-examination was properly sustained. But we think that the court erred in sustaining the objections of respondent to appellant's question to his own witnesses, as follows: "Do you know his [Townsend's] habits as to sobriety?" The mortuary tables had been introduced by respondent as evidence tending to show what was the probable expectation of life of persons of his age. These tables, as we understand it, are based upon what experience shows to be the average expectation of life of all persons of that age; and therefore, in rebuttal of that evidence, appellant was entitled to prove any fact tending to show that respondent's expectation of life was below such average. We apprehend that an insurance company would not take the same risk upon every man of respondent's age without particular inquiry as to his condition, upon the theory that the average expectation of life of persons of his age was a certain number of years. If we assume that the tables established a prima facie case of respondent's expectation of life, the appellant clearly had the right to overcome that prima facie case by showing facts which lessened that expectation; and the fact that respondent had the habit of drinking liquor to excess, or was a drunkard, was certainly a fact proper to be proved in that connection. It is contended that the question was properly excluded because it did not refer to the time of the alleged injury, which was about two years before the trial; but we see nothing in that contention. As "habits" are not formed hurriedly, it is probable that the question would have been proper as a preliminary one, even if the inquiry should have been confined to the date of the injury; but we do not see why it should have been so confined. The mortuary tables were introduced to show what, at the time they were introduced,—that is, at the time of the trial,—respondent's probable expectation of life was; and any fact which, at that time, lessened that expectation, was admissible. Suppose that after the date of the injury respondent had been attacked by some disease which is generally fatal, such as cancer or consumption; would not that fact have been admissible in evidence? We see no other points necessary to be specially noticed. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1893.)

ATTORNEY—ACTION FOR SERVICES—DAMAGES FOR NEGLIGENCE—UNPROFESSIONAL CONDUCT—INCORRECT ADVICE.

1. A client cannot recover of his attorney damages on account of negligence, in the absence of any injury to the client caused by such negligence.

2. In an action by an attorney to recover for professional services, defendant claimed damages for incompetency and negligence, and there was evidence that he employed plaintiff to prosecute certain actions to judgment for a fixed sum in each case, and that plaintiff was discharged before judgment for negligence and incompetency, in failing to file his pendens in two foreclosure suits. Held, that evidence that plaintiff explained to defendant the effect of filing and failure to file such notices, and the probable expense, and that defendant said he did not want to spend the money for filing them, was admissible.

3. In such case it is not error to exclude evidence that part of the property covered by one of the mortgages plaintiff was employed to foreclose was conveyed by the mortgagor before, but the deeds were not recorded until after, the foreclosure suit was commenced, where it appears that the remaining property sold for enough to satisfy defendant's judgment.

4. Where part of the services for which plaintiff seeks to recover consisted in examining the title to a lot, it is error to exclude evidence that, through the advice of plaintiff that the title was clear, defendant purchased the lot, and was afterwards compelled to redeem it from a prior tax lien.

5. It is not unprofessional conduct on the part of an attorney to bring an action on a just claim against a nonresident, and serve summons by publication, when employed to do so, with the hope that possibly the defendant therein will pay the judgment obtained, on its being sent to the place where he resides, though such attorney knows such action cannot be maintained, for want of jurisdiction.

6. But if the attorney advised his client, in such case, that the service by publication was good, and a valid judgment could be obtained, such attorney cannot recover for services rendered therein.

7. Where an attorney renders services in various matters, and the client makes a partial payment "on account of fees for legal services," the attorney cannot credit the money on certain items of his account, so as to place them beyond controversy.

Lacey & Trask and D. K. Trask, for appellant. A. G. Hinckley and Calvin Edgerton, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal was taken by the defendant from the judgment, and from the order refusing a new trial. It is an action to recover $675 for services as attorney at law, alleged to have been rendered defendant "between the 1st day of June, 1889, and the 1st day of June, 1891, in prosecuting and defending suits, and for like services, at his request, in drawing, copying, and engrossing of divers conveyances, deeds, and other paper writings, and for divers journeys and other attendances," etc. The defense consists of a general denial and of six counterclaims for damages alleged to have been caused by the negligence and incompetency of plaintiff as attorney, and of a demand for $125, money due from plaintiff to defendant. The case was tried with the aid of a jury, which rendered a general verdict against defendant for $325. The defendant not only attempted to recoup damages resulting from alleged negligence and incompetency of the plaintiff, but he claimed at the trial that such negligence and incompetency justified defendant in discharging plaintiff as his attorney, and that he was compelled to and did discharge him before the services were completed, and, further, that plaintiff had contracted to perform the services for a stipulated compensation for the entire services. Upon this point the court properly instructed the jury that under such circumstances, the contract being an entirety, plaintiff could not recover for his services. It is important to bear in mind, therefore, that the question of negligence is presented in two ways: First, on a claim to recover damages, and as a justification for the discharge of plaintiff as his attorney before the completion of the stipulated service. An action could not be maintained on account of the negligence or incompetency unless injury had resulted to the client, but the same negligence might justify and necessitate the discharge of the attorney, to avoid damage.

The first alleged error consists in an order striking out the first claim for damages, on the ground that the averments show that defendant was not injured. I think this ruling correct. It was averred that, in an action to foreclose a mortgage, plaintiff, through negligence, failed to file a notice of the pendency of the action. It appeared that no one acquired any interest in the mortgaged premises during the pendency of the suit; that defendant purchased the premises at the mortgage sale, paying the full amount of his debt and costs. It was not alleged that he was ignorant of the defect, if it was a defect. Not having been injured, he could not maintain an action for the alleged negligence. There was evidence at the time tending to show that defendant had employed plaintiff as his attorney to prosecute certain actions to final judgment, for a fixed and stipulated fee in each case, and that plaintiff had been discharged as such attorney, before the actions had been brought to judgment, for alleged negligence and incompetency, consisting partly in his failure to file such notices in two actions to foreclose mortgages for defendant. In regard to the matter the testimony of plaintiff and defendant was conflicting. Plaintiff testified: "Krug did not want to spend the money for filing them. I explained to him that, if no notice of action was filed, people who bought interests in the property could come in at any time and redeem. He said he did not want any such paper filed; the more people came in and redeemed, the better. I told him the expense in the Eddy suit would probably be four or five dollars for the lis pendens. I explained to him that he would have to have the title searched again before he took the decree, to see that nothing appeared of record, and if he decided not to file his lis pendens he would put me to that much extra trouble." The defendant testified positively that no such conversation occurred, and that nothing was said upon the subject; that he did not know that such a notice was required. Defendant objected to the testimony of plaintiff in regard to the conversation, and assigns the ruling admitting the testimony as error. The evidence was mainly directed to the question as to whether defendant was justified in discharging plaintiff as his attorney. While it may be doubted whether plaintiff sufficiently excused himself, I think the evidence was competent. Defendant complains, also, of certain instructions in regard to this matter, but the statement fails to show that any exception was reserved to the instructions at the trial.

At the trial, defendant offered in evidence a certificate of sale for taxes of a certain lot assessed to one Lossing, in which it appeared that taxes had not been paid upon the lot for the fiscal year 1887; also, a tax deed to one Tring for the lot, on failure to redeem; also, to show that defendant held a mortgage upon this lot; that the mortgagor proposed to convey the property to defendant in full payment, which offer the defendant accepted, provided he could get a good title, and employed plaintiff to examine it for him and to attend to the conveyance; that, through the advice of plaintiff that the title was clear, he took the deed, and then had to purchase the tax title, at a cost of $50. Plaintiff objected to this evidence on the ground that Lossing, the mortgagor, was admitted to be insolvent, and the tax lien was superior to the lien of the mortgage, and therefore defendant would have been compelled to redeem from the tax sale, even if he had foreclosed his mortgage. The objection was sustained, and defendant excepted. It is not necessary to say whether this evidence was inadmissible to prove the claim for damages founded upon this charge of negligence. It was clearly admissible, as going to the value of plaintiff's services. The service was within the allegations of the complaint.

Defendant also offered to show that a portion of the property included in one of his mortgages which he employed plaintiff to foreclose, for which service plaintiff is seeking compensation in this action, had been conveyed before the suit to foreclose was commenced, but that the deeds had not been recorded. This evidence was offered to show damage from failure to file notice of the action. But under the supposed conditions, as the remaining property was sold for enough to satisfy the defendant's judgment, the notice would have had no effect upon the alleged purchasers before the institution of the suit. Section 726, Code Civil Proc. The evidence was properly excluded.

The defendant asked the court to give the following instruction: "If an attorney brings an action that he knows cannot be maintained, merely for the purpose of 'bluffing' and 'bulldozing' the defendant, he is guilty of unprofessional conduct, violates his oath as an attorney, and cannot collect any compensation for services rendered in such action,"—which instruction the court refused to give, and defendant duly excepted. Such refusal is assigned as error. Defendant had a money demand against Thacker, who was residing in Seattle, Wash. Thacker had no property in this state. A suit was commenced against Thacker by plaintiff, as defendant's attorney, and a summons was taken out and published. Plaintiff had agreed to prosecute the action to judgment for $50, but was discharged before judgment was entered. Both parties testified in regard to the institution of the suit. Defendant said that plaintiff told him that such service would be good, and that the judgment could be sent to Seattle, and collected there. Plaintiff said: "I never intimated that we could get service of summons on them by publication when they were out of the state. There being no property in this state that we could levy upon, no attachment proceedings could be brought. I advised Mr. Krug against bringing the Thacker suits. I told him he could not recover anything on any judgment he might obtain. But, as he insisted on bringing the suit, I did the best I could. The object of the suit was not to recover any property, but was for a bluff,—to bulldoze, embarrass, and confound those defendants,—and the publication of summons in that case was not for the purpose of getting service on the parties." And again: "I made as much fun of it at the time as I could; tried to persuade him from it, saying that I didn't believe that it would have any effect whatever." Now, disregarding the motives stated by the witness, what was there in this that could "bulldoze" or confound the defendants? The action was believed to have been upon a just demand,—a fact contrary to the first assumption in the instruction asked. There was a possibility that the defendants would appear, and perhaps other suppositions might be made which would justify the proceeding. But, even if it were thought possible that, upon sending such a judgment to Seattle, defendants might pay it, it being a just demand, and no deceit being practiced, I see nothing unprofessional about it.

Defendant also asked another instruction which the court refused to give, and such ruling is also assigned as error. It was as follows: "The court instructs you that the attempted service of summons on the defendants by publication, where defendants reside out of the state, and when no property is brought within the jurisdiction of the court by attachment or otherwise, or when the action is not brought to determine the status of a person, is ineffectual, and judgment thereunder is void; and if you find from the evidence that the plaintiff attempted to serve said defendants in said Thacker suit by publication, and brought no property under the jurisdiction of the court thereby, and if you believe from the evidence that plaintiff advised defendant that such service was good, you must find against the plaintiff on his demand in said Thacker suit." I think this instruction should have been given. It is true an attorney is not always liable for mistakes, but here the plaintiff admits that he knew a judgment, under the circumstances assumed, would be invalid. The witnesses differ as to the facts, but the defendant had a right to have an instruction based upon the supposition that the jury would adopt his testimony. Plaintiff's counsel says they are not seeking to recover compensation for this service. But I think they are. It is clearly included in the complaint, and is found in the bill of particulars furnished by plaintiff. It is there marked "Paid."

It seems defendant made a payment of $125 generally "on account of fees for legal services." Plaintiff, in his bill of particulars, appears to have credited this upon certain items. He could not do this, and thus retain the money, and place those items beyond controversy. Besides, defendant claims to recover this money on a counterclaim. It would be a matter in controversy, even if in no other way. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

ROBINSON v. THORNTON et al. (No. 14, 819.)

EJECTMENT—DEFENSES—OUTSTANDING TITLE.

1. After foreclosure sale, but before execution of sheriff's deed, the mortgagor's interest in the land was attached. Judgment was not rendered till nine years later, and the land was sold a year after that. Four months after attachment, the judgment debtor, being still in possession, deeded the land to defendant, who thereupon took and kept possession, and paid taxes regularly thereafter. Held, that defendant could plead adverse possession running from the time he took possession, against plaintiff claiming under the sale in the attachment suit. This defense was not in effect a plea of outstanding title under the foreclosure sale, within the rule that in ejectment for lands purchased on execution against a debtor in possession when the lien attached defendant and his vendees cannot show that he had no title, or that the true title is outstanding.

2. Plaintiff could not introduce a deed from the assignee of the purchaser on the foreclosure sale, executed after this suit was begun, on the ground that defendant had put the foreclosure in evidence as an outstanding title. There was no issue of outstanding title, and the foreclosure was only introduced to show that the lien on which plaintiff's title was based had been extinguished.

McFarland and Garoutte, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Ejectment by C. P. Robinson against R. S. Thornton and Hannah Green. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Edward F. Fitzpatrick, (Fox, Kellogg & Gray, of counsel,) for appellants. T. M. Osment and D. M. Delmas, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Ejectment for land in San Mateo county. A certificate of purchase for the lands involved herein was issued to Benjamin S. Green by the register and receiver of the land office of the United States March 5, 1863, and a patent therefor was issued to him August 1, 1871. April 21, 1869, Green and wife mortgaged the land to C. C. Wilson and J. P. Jourdon, and in an action for the foreclosure of this mortgage, commenced September 6, 1870, a judgment was rendered under which the land was sold January 2, 1872, and on the same day the sheriff's certificate therefor filed in the office of the county recorder. July 3, 1872, the sheriff executed his deed to the purchaser, who, on the 26th day of September, 1872, conveyed his interest in the land to William Ford. April 1, 1872, John McCombe commenced an action in the fifteenth district court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, against Green and wife, and a writ of attachment was issued therein, under which the sheriff of San Mateo county on the next day purported to levy upon all the right, title, and interest of Green and wife in the land. Judgment was rendered in this action in favor of plaintiff November 5, 1880, and by virtue of an execution issued thereon the sheriff on December 10, 1881, sold the land to Alexander Forbes. June 4, 1887, the sheriff who made the sale executed a deed for the land, and on June 8, 1887, the sheriff then in office executed another deed therefor. The plaintiff claims title by virtue of these deeds, and on the 8th day of June, 1887, commenced the present action. August 17, 1872, B. S. Green executed a conveyance of the land to the appellant Thornton, who on the next day entered into the possession thereof, and has since remained in adverse possession and paid all the taxes levied thereon from the year 1872 until the time of trial. The plaintiff had judgment in the court below, from which, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

Whether there was sufficient evidence before the court to authorize it to find that the sheriff made an effective levy on the land by virtue of the writ of attachment issued in the action of McCombe v. Green need not be determined; but, assuming that such levy was made, it affected only the interest in the land which was then held by the defendants in the attachment. Prior to that date their interest in the land had been sold under the judgment in foreclosure against them, and the deed which was subsequently executed to the purchaser at that sale vested him with all the title to the land that the Greens had on the 21st day of April, 1869, (the date of the mortgage,) or which they had subsequently acquired therein, (Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 610, 29 Pac. Rep. 220,) and the interest or estate which the Greens had at the date of the attachment was thereby extinguished. The execution of the deed gave to the purchaser at the sale no new title to the land purchased by him, but was merely evidence that his title had become absolute. Upon the sale he acquired "all the right, title, interest, and claim of the judgment debtors thereto," (Code Civil Proc. § 700,) subject to be defeated by a redemption within six months, and to the right of the judgment debtors to remain in the possession of the land until the execution of the sheriff's deed, and all that remained in the Greens was this right of redemption, and to retain possession of the land until the expiration of the time therefor. "During the period which elapses between the sale and expiration of the time for redemption the statute regards the purchaser as the owner in equity, and gives him the rents and profits or the value of the use and occupation. In short, it gives him the entire beneficial interest in the property, except the actual possession." Page v. Rogers, 31 Cal. 302.

Judgment was not rendered in the action of McCombe v. Green until November 5, 1880, and at the date of the sale thereunder in December, 1881, the judgment debtors had no interest in the land upon which the judgment could be a lien; and, as their interest in the land that was attached had been extinguished, and with its extinguishment the lien of the attachment upon that interest was also extinguished, the land was not subject to a sale in satisfaction of the judgment. The conveyance by Green to Thornton August 17, 1872, did not transfer to him any title to the land, for the reason that at that date Green had no title or interest in the land. Thornton, however, took possession of the land on the 18th of August, 1872, and the record shows that since that date he has maintained such an adverse possession thereof as to vest him with a prescriptive title thereto, unless the other facts shown in relation to his possession of the land preclude him from acquiring such title or making this defense. In an action of ejectment to recover lands purchased at a sale under an execution issued upon a judgment against the defendant, and of which he was in possession at the time of the sale, or at the date of the lien of the judgment or attachment, (if there was an attachment,) the defendant cannot defeat the plaintiff's right to recover by showing that he had no title to the land, or that the true title is outstanding. Jackson v. Graham, 3 Caines, 188; Cooper v. Galbraith, 3 Wash. C. C. 550; Den v. Winans, 14 N. J. Law, 6; McDonald v. Badger, 23 Cal. 393; Blood v. Light, 38 Cal. 658. The same rule applies to the vendee of the judgment debtor, or any other person coming in under him subsequent to the creation of the lien, and who has no other title or claim to the lands than that which he derived from the judgment debtor, or whose title is, in effect, the same as that which was sold under the execution. Jackson v. Bush, 10 Johns. 223; Green v. Watrous, 17 Serg. & R. 398. As against the judgment debtor, the production of the judgment execution, and sheriff's deed is prima facie evidence of the plaintiff's right to recover; but, if the action is against a stranger to the judgment, the plaintiff must also show that the judgment debtor had the title or possession of the land at the date of the lien or of the sale. This prior possession will then be prima facie evidence of a right to recover as against the mere possession of the defendant, which will be deemed to have been taken subsequent to the sale. The sheriff's deed does not, however, transfer any after-acquired interest in the land, and the judgment debtor is not estopped from showing in an ejectment suit against him that, subsequent to the execution of the sale, he has acquired a different title from that which was sold under the judgment, (Emerson v. Sansome, 41 Cal. 552; and in an ejectment suit against the vendee of the judgment debtor he may also show, not only that he has acquired a different interest or right of possession, but also that the judgment debtor himself had no interest in the lands at the time of the sale. In one sense the grantee of land may be said to come into possession under his grantor, but his entry under his grantor is not in subordination to the title which he receives from him, or of that character which estops him from disputing the validity of the title under which he entered, as a tenant is estopped from disputing his landlord's title, or the vendee in possession under a contract of sale the title of his vendor. Even a tenant is not estopped from showing that his landlord's title under which he entered has terminated. Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 629. The grantee does not by his entry assume any obligation towards his grantor, nor is there any relation of trust or confidence between them which is forfeited by his repudiation of the title under which he entered, or by his acquisition of another outstanding title. By entering under the title he assumes it to be prima facie good, but he is not estopped thereby from showing otherwise, or from showing in any controversy another and independent title in himself. Hill v. Robertson, 1 Strob. 1. "The vendee claims the property for himself, and his faith is not pledged to maintain the title of the vendor. The rights of the vendor are intended to be extinguished by the sale, and he has no continuing interest in the maintenance of his title unless he should be called upon in consequence of some covenant or warranty in his deed. The property having become by the sale the property of the vendee, he has the right to fortify that title by the purchase of any other which may protect him in the quiet enjoyment of the premises. No principle of morality restrains him from doing this, nor is the letter or spirit of the contract violated by it." Blight's Lessee v. Rochester, 7 Wheat. 548. Delivering of possession under a deed of the fee does not, in the absence of any other recitals, raise an estoppel, since the possession then becomes wholly the possession of the grantee, and there is no obligation on his part to return it to the grantor. He may therefore dispute his title. 3 Washb. Real Prop. (5th Ed.) 99; Gardner v. Greene, 5 R. I. 110; Robertson v. Pickrell, 109 U. S. 608, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407; Sparrow v. Kingman, 1 N. Y. 242; Osterhout v. Shoemaker, 3 Hill, 513. In the case last cited, Bronson, J., giving the opinion of the court, said: "Although a tenant cannot question the right of his landlord, a grantee in fee may hold adversely to the grantor, and there can be no good reason why he should not be at liberty to deny that the grantor had any title. There is no estoppel when the occupant is under no obligation, express or implied, that he will at some time, or in some event, surrender the possession. The grantee in fee is under no such obligation. He does not receive the possession under any contract, express or implied, that he will ever give it up. He takes the land to hold for himself, and to dispose of it at pleasure. He owes no faith or allegiance to the grantor, and he does him no wrong when he treats him as an utter stranger to the title." The rights of the grantor are extinguished by the sale, and, as the property has thereby become the property of the grantee, he holds it with all the attributes of ownership, and is under no more accountability to his grantor for his estimate of the title taken from him than he is for the use to which he shall apply the land; and he may fortify his possession by the acquisition of any other title which may protect him in its enjoyment. "He holds adversely to all the world, and has the same right to deny the title of his vendor as the title of any other party." Merryman v. Bourne, 9 Wall. 600; Winlock v. Hardy, 4 Litt. 262; Voorhies v. White, 2 A. K. Marsh. 276. His possession becomes adverse to his grantor immediately upon his entry under the grant, and by this adverse possession he may acquire a title by prescription which will be as available for the protection of his possession as one acquired by grant. Croxall v. Shererd, 5 Wall. 268. Whether the possession which Thornton took of the land in August, 1872, is to be regarded as having been taken by virtue of the grant from Green, or without any color of title, it immediately became adverse to the whole world. Green himself would be estopped by his deed from claiming any title in the land, and as whatever title Green had at the date of the attachment had been extinguished prior to the time when Thornton took possession of the land, the lien of the attachment against his interest was terminated, and could no longer form a basis for the support of any sale that might be made under the judgment afterwards obtained in the action. At the date of the sale in 1881, Thornton had acquired a title by prescription which gave him the right to the possession of the land (Civil Code, § 1007) superior to any claim of the plaintiff resting upon the prior possession of the Greens.

The rule that the statute of limitations does not begin to run against the judgment debtor, or one claiming under him, until the execution of the sheriff's deed, has no application to the present case. That rule rests upon the proposition that the sheriff's deed is the deed of the defendant under the execution, and that the defendant's possession after the sale cannot be adverse to the purchaser until the execution of his own deed by the sheriff. The rule has no application to a stranger to the judgment, or one whose title is not derived from the judgment debtor. In Jefferson v. Wendt, 51 Cal. 573, the defendants were only the tenants of the judgment debtor, whose interest had been sold by the sheriff; and in Leonard v. Flynn, 89 Cal. 535, 26 Pac. Rep. 1097, the defendant had no title other than that which he had received from the judgment debtor, and had acquired this title within five years prior to the commencement of the action.

The court erred in permitting the plaintiff to offer in evidence the deed of the land executed to him by the assignee in bankruptcy of Ford, subsequent to the commencement of the action. The respondent seeks to sustain this ruling upon the theory that the defendant had shown that this title was outstanding, and that it was competent for the plaintiff to show that it was not an available title against the plaintiff for the reason that he had acquired it. The defendant, however, did not offer evidence of the sale under the foreclosure for the purpose of showing an outstanding title, for there was no such issue before the court, but for the purpose of showing that the lien which the plaintiff claimed as the basis of his own title had been extinguished thereby. That the introduction of the deed was injurious to the defendant is evident without any discussion.

The appellant Hannah Green, by her answer, admitted all the allegations of the complaint, and consequently is not entitled to a reversal.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed as to the appellant Thornton, and affirmed as to the appellant Hannah Green.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent.

GAROUTTE, J., (dissenting.) Green was the owner of certain land. It was sold under foreclosure proceedings by his mortgagee. Pending the issuance of the sheriff's deed, and during Green's possession, it was attached as Green's property. Subsequent to the attachment, Green deeded it to the defendant Thornton, who entered into the possession thereof. The attachment proceedings ripened into a judgment, sale under execution, and deed by the sheriff. Plaintiff, as the holder of such deed, brings an action of ejectment against Thornton, who entered under his deed from Green. Thornton pleads the statute of limitations, claiming to have held possession adversely to the world for the statutory period.

I premise a short statement of my views by suggesting that the rule so often declared in the decisions of courts that the plaintiff must recover in ejectment upon the strength of his own title is not without exception. The principle of estoppel is often invoked in such cases, and the defendant debarred from attacking plaintiff's title by showing a better title in a stranger. This is always true where the claims of both parties arise from a common source. If the leading opinion in this case holds that the grantee of the attachment debtor may enter under his grant, and then successfully plead the statute of limitations as against the holder of the sheriff's deed, which is in due course procured by virtue of the attachment suit, (and such appears to be the reasoning,) I dissent. This identical principle was before the supreme court of the United States in Pratt v. Pratt, 96 U. S. 710, and was there carefully considered and declared unsound. In that opinion the court used the following illustration, which is both simple and conclusive: "If this be established to be the law, the owner of real estate may borrow money on ten years' time to the value of that estate, and give a mortgage on it to secure payment, and by a sale and conveyance of the land to a third person, with delivery of possession a week afterwards, the lien is utterly defeated; for, according to this doctrine, the statute of limitation begins to run against the mortgagee the moment the title and possession are vested in the purchaser, and the bar of the statute becomes perfect against all the world by seven years' possession; whereas the mortgagee can take no steps to foreclose his mortgage until his money comes due three years later." In the present case the defendant can hardly be said to plead the statute of limitations. His plea is little more than a denial of plaintiff's title. The plea of the statute of limitations presupposes a right of action in the plaintiff at some time in the past, but that, owing to his laches, it has lapsed. In the present case it is not contended that plaintiff's right of action has lapsed, but it is insisted that he never at any time had a right of action. We have held in Jefferson v. Wendt, 51 Cal. 573, and Leonard v. Flynn, 89 Cal. 536, 26 Pac. Rep. 1097, that a plaintiff's right of action accrues upon the delivery of the sheriff's deed. Eliminating for the moment the foreclosure proceedings from the case, it seems to me very plain that defendant Thornton could not create in himself a title by adverse possession, for no one had a right of entry as against him. Green had no right of entry, for he was his grantor; plaintiff none, for he had not as yet obtained his sheriff's deed. As is said in Pratt v. Pratt, supra: "In the just sense of the term his possession is not adverse to this lien. There can be no adversary rights in regard to the possession under the lien and under the defendant's purchase from the judgment debtor until the lien is converted into a title conferring the right of possession. The defendant's possession after this is adverse to the title of plaintiff; and then, with the right of entry in plaintiff, the bar of the statute begins to run."

Let us assume that plaintiff, Robinson, secured his sheriff's deed within five years from the date of Thornton's entry under his deed from Green, and that he then brought his action. I know of no way that Thornton could have defeated plaintiff's claim. The statute of limitations could not have availed him, as his possession had not extended for sufficient length of time, and, as we have seen, this is his only defense. Now, it seems strange that plaintiff should be defeated because, without fault of his, he was unable to secure his deed within five years from Thornton's entry. If he had secured his deed at the end of four years from the entry of Thornton, his cause of action would then have accrued, and, as we have seen, he could have recovered possession of the land. If he had a cause of action at that time, and not till that time, the statute did not begin to run against him until then, and he could not have lost his right to bring suit until five years thereafter. If such were not the fact, plaintiff had a cause of action for the recovery of real estate which became barred within one year after it accrued. That result would be novel in the extreme.

Again, instead of foreclosure proceedings against Green, let us assume that he deeded outright to a stranger, then deeded to plaintiff, and then, while in possession, deeded to defendant, who took possession under the deed. If plaintiff had brought this action under these circumstances within five years from the date of his deed, there would have been no defense to the action on the part of this defendant. Let us assume the deed to a stranger in lieu of the foreclosure proceedings, and then the levy of the attachment, followed by the deed to the defendant and the sheriff's deed to plaintiff. Plaintiff's sheriff's deed related to the date of the levy, and when he received it he occupied the same position as if it had been a deed from Green of the date of the levy; and we have seen that if it had been Green's deed of that date plaintiff could recover. As already suggested, defendant's plea of the statute of limitations in this case is almost a misnomer, as it is practically a plea of no title in plaintiff. Let us see if such is not the fact. We will assume that the foreclosure proceedings were fatally defective, and the deed thereunder void, what is plaintiff's status in the case then? Why, the title was in Green at the date of the levy, and the sheriff's deed vested it in plaintiff, Robinson, under which he would have a cause of action that defendant could not contest for a moment. It follows that, if the foreclosure proceedings are void, then plaintiff's cause of action accrued when he received his deed from the sheriff, and defendant's plea of the statute would be in vain. Upon the contrary, if those proceedings are valid, plaintiff has no cause of action, and the plea of the statute can be successfully invoked. In other words, if the legal title is in the plaintiff, the statute cannot be pleaded; but if the legal title is in a stranger, it can be pleaded. I fail to see the distinction, and do not think the successful plea of the statute is dependent upon any such test.

For the foregoing reasons it is apparent to me that the so-called "plea of the statute of limitations," as far as practical results are concerned, is nothing more than a plea of outstanding title in a stranger under the deed in foreclosure, and it must be conceded, if such be the fact, the plaintiff is entitled to recover. Defendant offered the foreclosure proceedings in evidence. The prevailing opinion says for the purpose of showing that at the date of the levy of the attachment Green had no interest in the land, and that consequently plaintiff got nothing by his deed. I would suggest those proceedings fall to show it, for Green had the lawful "possession" at the date of the levy, and if he had still been in possession when plaintiff received his deed there could be no question as to plaintiff's right of recovery. But, aside from that, these proceedings simply show an equitable title in a stranger at the date of the levy, and the result was simply an outstanding title when this litigation began. It cannot be possible that plaintiff's cause of action would be stronger if the sheriff's deed under foreclosure had issued prior to the levy of the attachment; yet such would seem to follow from the reasoning of the prevailing opinion. The foreclosure proceeding, as an element in this case, in no way aids the defendant as to his plea of the statute of limitations; and, omitting that element of the case, we then have an exact photograph of Pratt v. Pratt, and the reasoning there found leaves the defendant with no prop to support him. The title under the foreclosure being an outstanding title, it availed defendant nothing. Perhaps he was estopped from setting it up, having entered under a deed from a common grantor with the plaintiff. But, aside from that, at the trial plaintiff showed that such title was then vested in him, and for that reason its efficacy as a defense was entirely gone. See Sedg. & W. Tr. Title Land, § 831; Sharp v. Johnson, 22 Ark. 79; Perryman's Lessee v. Callison, 1 Overt. 516.

TOBIN v. OMNIBUS CABLE CO. (No. 15, 162.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1893.)
STREET-CAR COMPANIES—INJURY TO PASSENGER—ALIGHTING FROM CAR IN MOTION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action against a cable-car company for injuries received in alighting from a car alleged to have been prematurely started, after instructing the jury that common carriers of passengers must use such vigilance and foresight as they can, under the circumstances, in view of the character and mode of conveyance adopted, to prevent accidents, it was not improper to instruct that "it was the defendant's business to know, before starting up the car, whether passengers getting off or on the car were in a position to be injured, and it would be negligence to start the car suddenly, under such circumstances, without exercising every precaution for the safety of those who might be getting off or on."

2. One is guilty of contributory negligence if he is guilty of want of ordinary care, and the want of extraordinary care, merely, is no defense.

3. Negligence on plaintiff's part, amounting to absence of ordinary care, which, concurrently with the negligence of defendant, proximately contributes to the injury, is a good defense, whether or not defendant, with ordinary or extraordinary care, could have guarded against it.

4. In an action against a street-car company for personal injuries, plaintiff claimed, and the evidence tended to prove, that a car was started while she was alighting therefrom, while defendant claimed, and gave evidence to show, that the car was started before plaintiff left her seat, and that she tried to get off while the car was in motion. Held, that an instruction making the defense of contributory negligence dependent on whether defendant could have guarded against such negligence was rendered harmless by subsequent instructions that the verdict must be for the defendant if the injuries were caused either solely by plaintiff's negligence, or, jointly and concurrently, by the negligence of plaintiff and defendant or its servants, and that if plaintiff, knowing the car was in motion, chose to run her chances, and get off by stepping directly out from the car, she must abide the risks she took.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Mary Tobin against the Omnibus Cable Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. H. Wilson, for appellant. Henley & Swift, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The defendant is an incorporated cable railway company, operating on Post street and certain other streets in the city of San Francisco. The plaintiff was a passenger on one of defendant's cars, and, while attempting to alight from the car at the junction of Post and Kearny streets, was thrown upon the pavement by the movement of the car, and personally injured. This action was brought to recover $30,000 damages for the injury, which, it is alleged, resulted solely from the negligence of the defendant. A trial by jury resulted in a verdict for plaintiff, assessing the damages at $10,000. On defendant's motion for a new trial the court ordered that if, within 10 days, the plaintiff remit $3,000 from the damages assessed by the jury, the motion for new trial "will be denied; otherwise it will be granted." The plaintiff accordingly remitted $3,000, and a new trial was denied, and judgment entered for $7,000.

The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying a new trial.

1. Counsel for appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to justify a verdict of negligence on the part of the defendant, and, if it is, that it shows contributory negligence of the plaintiff. As to each of these issues, there is a substantial conflict of evidence, and therefore the verdict should not be disturbed on either of these grounds. Whether there was negligence of defendant, or contributory negligence of the plaintiff, ultimately depends upon whether the car was started while plaintiff was in the act of getting off, under such circumstances that, with due care for her safety, the gripman could and would have discovered that she was in the act of alighting before he started the car, by the movement of which, it is admitted, she was thrown down and injured. The plaintiff was seated on the left-hand side of the open section of the car, (the dummy,) in the middle compartment of that seat; there being three compartments, each sufficient to seat two passengers. She occupied the rear of the apartment, so that her right side adjoined the middle of the seat. The gripman stood at or near the center of the dummy while gripping the cable, and as nearly to the plaintiff's seat as to any other seat on the dummy. The plaintiff testified: "I was alongside of the gripman. My right shoulder was right together with his arm,"—and this was not disputed. The gripman, Mr. Huntly, testified: "I do not pay any attention to the passengers upon the inside of the car. The conductor looks after them. It is my duty to look after the passengers that are on the open section, with reference to their getting on or off." There are two steps below the seat, and plaintiff's feet, while sitting, rested on the upper step, so that in getting off she must have descended two steps. The evidence on the part of plaintiff tends to prove that she was making the second step, having one foot on or near the ground, the other upon the lower step, and holding to the stanchion with her left hand, when the gripman suddenly started the car, and also tends to prove that with ordinary care the gripman would have seen that plaintiff had risen from her seat, and was stepping down, before he gripped the cable. To these points the testimony of the plaintiff and Mrs. Meyers is quite positive, and to some extent is corroborated by Morris Sperling, a witness on the part of defendant. It appears that the plaintiff was 64 years of age, and that by the fall she was permanently injured, by a fracture of the neck of the femur.

2. It is claimed that the court erred in instructing the jury that "it was the defendant's business to know, before starting up the car, whether passengers getting off or on the car were in a position to be injured; and it would be negligence to start the car suddenly, under such circumstances, without exercising every precaution for the safety of those who might be getting off or on." As applied to the cable street cars of the defendant, and to the facts of this case, in connection with other instructions given, the instruction seems to be correct. It does not, as contended by counsel, instruct that it would be negligence on the part of the defendant not to know absolutely, under all circumstances, that passengers getting off or on are not in a condition to be injured, but that "it would be negligence to start the car suddenly, under such circumstances, (the circumstances of this case,) without exercising every precaution for the safety of those who might be getting off or on," and that it was defendant's "business" to know (not that it must absolutely know under all circumstances) that passengers were not in a condition to be injured by starting the car. The court had before defined the degree of care required of common carriers of passengers as follows: "Common carriers of passengers are required to do all that human care, vigilance, and foresight reasonably can, under the circumstances, in view of the character and mode of conveyance adopted, to prevent accidents to passengers." Read in connection with this, the instruction in question could not have been understood to mean that the failure of the defendant to know, under all circumstances, whether passengers are in condition to be injured by starting the car, is negligence.

3. The court, of its own motion, gave the following instruction as to the law of contributory negligence, in addition to instructions upon the same subject before given at the request of counsel for defendant: "Now, here is an instruction—a definition of this matter of contributory negligence—which is sometimes confusing to a jury, and which I will give you as follows: 'Contributory negligence' is defined to be, not any degree of negligence, however slight, which concurs in producing an injury, but it must be negligence amounting to the absence of ordinary care, and which contributes proximately or directly to the injury complained of, and against which negligence the defendant, being aware of it, could not have guarded." Immediately after this instruction was given, counsel for defendant asked if it was given by the court of its own motion, saying, if it was, he would like to except to it. Upon being informed by the court that it was given by the court, counsel said: "Then I desire to take an exception as to that. I understand I have to do that now,"—but stated no ground of objection to the instruction, though he seems to have understood that it was oral. In his brief here, for the first time, counsel states two grounds of objection to this instruction: First, that it defines the degree of contributory negligence necessary to constitute a defense to be a want of only ordinary care on the part of the passenger, whereas it is claimed that a want of extraordinary care, contributory to the injury in the slightest degree, is sufficient to constitute a defense. I think this objection is answered in the opinion of this court, by Mr. Justice McKinstry, in the case of Robinson v. Railroad Co., 48 Cal. 422, 423, where it was said: "The law regards the plaintiff as innocent * * * unless the evidence shows a want of ordinary care and prudence on his part. His failure to take great care is no defense. Shear. & R. Neg. § 29. The formula is, not that any degree of negligence on the part of the plaintiff, which directly concurs in producing the injury, (however slight,) will constitute a defense; but if the negligence of the plaintiff, which amounts to the absence of ordinary care, shall contribute, in any degree, proximately to the injury, the plaintiff shall not recover." This was repeated in the case of Strong v. Railroad Co., 61 Cal. 328, wherein the court, by the same learned justice, said: "Plaintiff had a right to rely upon the performance, by those on the locomotive, of every act imposed by law upon them when approaching a crossing. In a legal sense, he was innocent of negligence unless there was a want of ordinary care and prudence on his part. The rule is not that any degree of negligence, however slight, which directly concurs in producing the injury, will prevent a recovery; but if the negligence of the plaintiff, amounting to the absence of ordinary care, shall contribute proximately, in any degree, to the injury, the plaintiff shall not recover." See Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 20.

The second objection to the instruction is that the last clause of the instruction, in these words, "and against which negligence the defendant, being aware of it, could not have guarded," is erroneous, in that it requires of the defendant more than ordinary care to guard against injurious consequences from negligence of the plaintiff of which defendant was aware; it being claimed that this last clause of the instruction should have been qualified by adding thereto the words, "by the exercise of ordinary care,"—that is to say, that the carrier, though notified of such negligence of the passenger as exposes the latter to danger of personal injury, is required to exercise only ordinary care to avoid or avert the impending injurious consequences of such negligence, and not that extraordinary degree of care which would have been required but for the negligence of the passenger. Contributory negligence of the plaintiff, as a defense, in cases of this kind, implies negligence of some degree on the part of the defendant, and is consistent with any degree of mere negligence of the defendant. Therefore, whenever it is found that the negligence of the plaintiff—that is, want of ordinary care on his part—proximately contributed to his injury in any degree, then the degree of care or negligence on the part of the defendant becomes wholly immaterial. Holmes v. Railway Co., 97 Cal. 161, 31 Pac.

Rep. 834; Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 26. The instruction purports to be a definition of that species of contributory negligence which constitutes a defense, and states all the essential attributes of that species, namely, "negligence amounting to the absence of ordinary care, and which contributes proximately or directly to the injury complained of," but erroneously added that it must be such negligence as the defendant, if aware of it, could not have guarded against. This additional attribute perverts the definition; and the qualification of it asked by appellant does not rectify the error, since negligence of the plaintiff, amounting to absence of ordinary care, which, concurrently with the negligence of defendant, proximately contributes to the injury complained of, is a good defense, whether the defendant could or could not, with ordinary or even extraordinary care, have guarded against it. Beach, Contrib. Neg. §§ 14, 35. It should be observed, however, that the negligence of defendant in such case is mere negligence, in the proper sense of the word, exclusive of malice, and consequently exclusive of such reckless conduct of defendant as would be sufficient proof of malice. Whart. Neg. §§ 14, 22. In a definition of the degree of care required of defendant in cases where the negligence of the plaintiff contributes to his injury only as a condition precedent, and remotely, and therefore does not constitute a defense, as in the line of cases of which Davies v. Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 545, Needham v. Railroad Co., 37 Cal. 409, and Meeks v. Railroad Co., 56 Cal. 513, are examples, the qualification asked by appellant of the last clause of the instruction might have been material, and perhaps proper. But, in a definition of "contributory negligence" as a defense, the last clause of the instruction, either as given, or with the qualification asked by appellant, had no proper place. It follows that, if the trial court had qualified the instruction as here proposed by appellant, the result would have been only to substitute one error for another, the refusal to do which, even at the special request of the defendant, would not have been error. But conceding that the exception, as taken in the lower court, is a sufficient foundation to support any objection to the instruction that counsel may desire to make here, still the only objection made here is that the court failed to qualify the instruction in the respect above stated, so that the error, such as it is conceded to be, is not pointed to or complained of here, and as a general rule this court will not reverse a judgment on account of error not pointed out or complained of by the appellant; the reason for this being that, counsel for appellant having specified the errors of which he complains, it is presumed that he deems others, if such there be, either harmless, or favorable to his client. If there is any exception to this rule, it will be found only in cases wherein it appears that the error not objected to was at least probably prejudicial to the appellant, and this case is not of that class. Indeed, I cannot conceive how the defendant could have been injured by the instruction in question. It was not questioned that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and therefore could not recover, if she started to alight after the car had started; and the very concrete instructions given at request of defendant were to this effect, and quite as favorable as defendant was entitled to ask. Among these were the following: "Fourth. The jury are instructed that if they find from all the evidence that the injuries in question were occasioned either solely by the negligence of the plaintiff, or, jointly and concurrently, by the negligence of the plaintiff and the defendant or its servants, then the verdict should be for the defendant;" and again: "* * * Eighth. If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, knowing that the car was in motion, chose to run her chances, and get off by stepping directly out from the car, she must abide the risks that she took." The plaintiff claimed, and the evidence on her part tended to prove, that the car was started while she was in the act of alighting; and, on the other hand, defendant claimed, and gave evidence tending to prove, that the car was started before plaintiff moved from her seat, and that she started to get off while the car was moving. There was no evidence, and appears to have been no claim, that the defendant, by any degree of care, possibly could have avoided the accident after the car started. Under the instructions given at defendant's request, the verdict must have hinged solely upon the questions whether the plaintiff was in the act of alighting before the car started, and whether, with due care, the gripman would have known that fact before he started the car; and, upon conflicting evidence, the jury resolved both these questions against the defendant. In respect to whether the conceded error was harmless or not, this case seems entirely analogous to that of Craven v. Railroad Co., 72 Cal. 345, 13 Pac. Rep. 878, in which an instruction defining "contributory negligence" was excepted to on a valid ground, and conceded to be erroneous, but held to be harmless, and therefore not a sufficient cause for a reversal of the judgment.

4. It is contended that, when the court found that the damages assessed by the jury were excessive, it should have granted a new trial on that ground, and had no authority to refuse it on the condition that plaintiff would remit $3,000. After the remittal of $3,000, no legal ground appears for holding the damages recovered ($7,000) excessive. That the trial court had authority to make the conditional order complained of, and did not err in making it, is too firmly established in this state to be questioned. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

EDWARDS v. SAN JOSE PRINTING & PUB. CO. et al. (No. 14,997.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1893.)

LIBEL — WHAT CONSTITUTES — JUDICIAL NOTICE — EVIDENCE — MITIGATION — INSTRUCTION — NOMINAL DAMAGES.

1. Defendants, on the day of a local election, published concerning plaintiff, E., the following: "Venality. It is understood that the Electric Improvement Company will put a large sum of money into the fight to-day to corrupt voters. There are scores of voters in every community that money can buy. * * * It is also reported that E. is to have charge of the sack." Held, that the article was libelous per se.

2. In an action for publishing such article, the court will take notice of the meaning the word "sack" has acquired in newspaper literature, when used in connection with election corruption funds, and it is unnecessary for plaintiff to allege or prove such meaning, or how it was intended to be, or was, understood by persons reading the article.

3. Evidence by the editor of defendants' paper, in which the article was published, that rumors and reports of the facts published came to him from dozens of persons, and that he published the article in good faith, to prevent what it was feared would occur, is not admissible in mitigation, in the absence of the names of the persons giving him the information, and of evidence to show that the informants possessed such character as would command a belief in the truth of their utterances.

4. Nor is evidence admissible to show particular acts of plaintiff in relation to the use of money in elections prior to such publication, without showing, or offering to show, that defendants had knowledge of such acts at the time of publication, even if otherwise competent.

5. There was evidence that plaintiff's reputation was that of a person having money under his control for the purpose of corrupting voters, and also evidence to the contrary. Held, that the court properly refused to charge that if plaintiff's reputation was bad, prior to the publication, as to the point wherein he claimed to be damaged, the jury might fix nominal damages only.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by H. J. Edwards against the San Jose Printing & Publishing Company and others to recover damages for libel. From a judgment entered on the verdict of a jury in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

S. G. Tompkins and Frs. E. Spencer, for appellants. Richards & Welch, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The complaint in this action alleges that the defendants published in a certain newspaper, of and concerning the plaintiff, a false and malicious writing, in the words following: "Venality. It is understood that the Electric Improvement Company will put a large sum of money into the fight to-day to corrupt voters. There are scores of voters in every community that money can buy. * * * It is also reported that Edwards is to have charge of the sack." The plaintiff further alleges that, on the day of the publication of this article, there was held an election in the city of San Jose, for the election of certain officers of the city, and that there was an active contest between the several political parties for the success of their respective candidates, and that by the words, "into the fight to-day," in the said publication, the defendants meant to say, and were understood to mean, "into the election contest to-day." The complaint contained the further allegation: "That by the sentence and expression in the above publication, 'that Edwards is to have charge of the sack,' the said defendants, and each of them, intended to be understood, and were understood, to mean that the plaintiff herein was to expend, and direct the expenditure of, a large sum of money, of the said Electric Improvement Company of San Jose, to buy votes and corrupt the voters of said city in said city election." The answer of defendants contained, among other matters, a denial of this allegation of the complaint, and also alleged, by way of further defense to the cause of action stated in the complaint, that prior to the publication of the alleged libel there was a report or rumor current in the city of San Jose, "and the same came frequently to the ears of the defendants, that the Electric Improvement Company, in plaintiff's complaint mentioned, was to place a large sum of money in said fight or election contest in the city of San Jose for the purpose of corrupting voters, and that H. J. Edwards was to have charge of the sack, and that defendants in good faith believed the report to be true, for the reason, among others, that plaintiff's reputation for having charge of money for the purpose of manipulating politicians or corrupting voters was bad, and for the further reason that plaintiff had on various previous occasions control of large sums of money to be used for the purpose of manipulating politicians and corrupting voters in elections;" and then the answer proceeded to specify the dates when, and the different amounts in the hands of the plaintiff for such purposes upon the dates given. The defendants further alleged that the publication complained of was made by them in good faith, and in the interest of good government. The case was tried by a jury, and the plaintiff recovered a judgment for the sum of $750 and costs, and the defendants appeal. The plaintiff introduced no evidence to show the meaning of the sentence, "It is also reported that Edwards is to have charge of the sack," contained in the alleged libel, or that defendants thereby were understood to mean that plaintiff was to expend, and direct the expenditure of, money to buy votes and corrupt voters in the election mentioned in the complaint, and the defendants moved for a nonsuit upon this ground, which motion was denied; and the court, in submitting the case to the jury, instructed them that the article complained of was a libel per se, and that upon its face it imputed "to the plaintiff conduct or the possession of a character which would lead him to commit acts, and that he was about to commit acts, which if true, would subject him to obloquy in the community." The defendants insist that this instruction was erroneous, and that their motion for a nonsuit should have been granted, and in support of their position contend that the word "sack," according to the ordinary definition given by lexicographers, does not import a corruption fund, and that, if it has any such peculiar meaning attached to it as a slang phrase, it was incumbent upon plaintiff, not only to so allege, but also to prove such meaning, and that the word was understood to have such meaning by persons reading the article complained of.

There can be no doubt that when a slander or libel is couched in language having a covert meaning, not apparent upon its face, or in words or phrases not used otherwise than as slang, or cant terms, it is necessary for a plaintiff not only to allege and prove the slanderous or libelous sense in which the words were used by the defendant, but also that they were understood in the same sense by those to whom they were addressed. The following cases may be cited to sustain this proposition: Maynard v. Insurance Co., 34 Cal. 48; Id., 47 Cal. 207; Andrews v. Woodmansee, 15 Wend. 232. But we are of the opinion that this case does not fall within the rule just stated. Courts cannot affect to be ignorant of the recent meaning which the word "sack" has acquired in the current newspaper literature of the day, when used in the connection in which it appears in the publication complained of. As thus used, it signifies a fund in hand to be used for purposes of corruption; and to say that a person has charge of such a fund to be used on a given occasion is, in effect, to say that such person is to disburse the fund for the purposes of corruption. This meaning was doubtless first given to the word by vile and corrupt persons engaged in distributing and receiving such funds, and, when first used in that sense, might well have been regarded as a slang expression, of the meaning of which courts would not then have taken judicial notice; but it is now so frequently used to convey this particular meaning that it can hardly be considered, when employed for that purpose, as simply the language of slang, and understood only by the vulgar. In the case of Bailey v. Publishing Co., 40 Mich. 251, the plaintiff, a minister, brought an action for the recovery of damages for a libel couched in the following words: "Then there was that Iowa Beecher business of his, which beat him out of a station at Grass Lake. But pshaw! These reformers are pretty much all alike." The trial court left it to the jury to determine whether this language involved a charge of adultery, and the court, in speaking of this, said: "It was set forth in the declaration as intended to charge adultery, and the justificatory notice did not except it. Moreover, inasmuch as courts have no right to be ignorant of the meaning of current phrases, which everybody else understands, it can hardly be seriously urged that such a charge, coupled with an averment that it lost a minister his situation, and backed with a justification, should be assumed, without some explanation, to be capable of an innocent meaning. Defendant was bound to show a loss of position at Grass Lake upon some charge of immoral conduct affecting the plaintiff's clerical character, in order to justify this charge." Indeed, the law may now be considered as settled that courts will understand words in general use in the same sense in which they are usually understood by the masses of men, and that no allegation or proof of such meaning is necessary; and under this rule the plaintiff was not required to allege or prove the meaning of the word "sack," as used in the alleged libel, or how it was intended to be, or was, understood by persons reading it, the word having a well-understood meaning in the connection in which it is there used.

The editor of the newspaper in which the alleged libel was published, and one of the defendants in the case, was a witness upon the trial, and testified as follows: "These reports came to my ears from various parties, whom I cannot mention. I know that many people said to me that Mr. Edwards was a political manipulator, and that he would use money as he had done heretofore. It was from a knowledge of these facts that I have hinted at that told me,—rumors that reached me from various parties that led me to the proposition. But you will notice that I did not charge Mr. Edwards with the use of money, but only stated that it was expected—reported—that he was to have charge of the sack. The whole libel lies right in that, and I used the license and liberty which I had, as editor of the paper, to announce it. * * * As to the names of the parties who reported these rumors, I presume there were dozens of them. I do not know. * * * I used my editorial prerogative to announce that fact, and I did it for the purpose of warning the company against anything of that kind. * * * I did it for a good purpose, and to prevent the very thing which it was feared would occur."

This testimony was, on motion of plaintiff, stricken out, and the ruling of the court upon the motion is assigned as error by the defendants. It is claimed by them that this evidence was admissible in mitigation of damages, and that it tended to show good faith, and want of malice, in the publication. We think, however, that the evidence was properly excluded. The mere belief of the editor of a newspaper in the justice and truth of an attack which he makes upon the private character of a citizen is no defense to an action brought by the person assailed for the damages sustained by such attack, nor can such belief be considered in mitigation of damages, unless it is shown to have been based upon information derived from a reliable source. It must be shown that the charge was only made after due investigation of the matter to which it relates. In the case of Bronson v. Bruce, 59 Mich. 475, 26 Pac. Rep. 671, it is said: "If the charges were false, and made in an honest belief of their truth, after reasonable and proper investigation, such fact would go to mitigate damages, and under certain circumstances * * * the jurors would be warranted in reducing the damages to a minimum." And in Wilson v. Fitch, 41 Cal. 383, this court said: "Nor can a defamatory publication in a public journal be said to be privileged simply because it relates to a subject of public interest, and was published in good faith, without malice, and from laudable motives. No adjudicated case, that I am aware of, has ever gone so far. But whilst such publications cannot be deemed privileged, so as to require proof of express malice, the publisher, in order to rebut the presumption of malice, should be allowed the fullest opportunity to show the circumstances under which the publication was made, the sources of his information, and the motives which induced the publication. The public interest, and a due regard to the freedom of the press, demands that its conductors should not be mulcted in punitive damages for publications on subjects of public interest, made from laudable motives, after due inquiry as to the truth of the facts stated, and in the honest belief that they were true." The testimony stricken out did not tend to bring the defendants within the protection of this rule, which permits the mitigation of damages when a publication reflecting upon the character of another has been made in good faith. It only tended to show that others, whose names the witness did not give, believed or suspected that the plaintiff would be guilty of using money to influence the election then pending. The witness did not state that any reliable person, professing to have any knowledge of the fact, gave him any information to the effect that plaintiff was to corruptly disburse money for the purpose of bribing voters in the election then to occur. If he received any such information, it was also important to state the name of the informant, that the jury might judge whether his character was such that the defendant might reasonably have placed reliance upon his statements. The last sentence of the publication, "It is reported that Edwards is to have charge of the sack," imports something else than that there was an idle rumor to that effect, not entitled to credit or consideration. It is equivalent to the assertion that there was a well-founded report to that effect, and one which the publishers, after due inquiry and investigation, believed to be true, and, in effect, was the same as a direct charge of the fact; and, to enable defendants to mitigate the damages resulting from such a statement, it was incumbent upon them to give the sources of their information, and to show that their informants were possessed of such character and standing as would command a belief in the truth of their utterances. The liberty of the press is not more under the protection of the constitution than the liberty of speech, and the publisher of a newspaper can only defend an action for libel, or mitigate the damages to be recovered therefor, upon precisely the same grounds as any other individual could defend an action for slander in uttering the same words upon the street. "The liberty of the press, as the law now stands, is only a more extensive and improved use of the liberty of speech which prevailed before printing became general; and, independently of certain statutory provisions, the law recognizes no distinction in principle between a publication by the proprietor of a newspaper and a publication by any other person. A newspaper proprietor is not privileged, as such, in the dissemination of the news, but is liable for what he publishes in the same manner as any other individual. McAllister v. Free Press Co., 76 Mich. 338, 43 N. W. Rep. 431.

The court did not err in excluding the testimony of the witnesses Willey and Savage, which was offered for the purpose of proving particular acts of plaintiff in relation to the use of money in elections prior to the publication of the libel set out in the complaint. Assuming that evidence of such acts was otherwise competent, it would not be admissible without showing, or offering to show, that the defendants had knowledge of such acts when they made the publication complained of, and there was no offer upon the part of the defendants to show such knowledge. Hatfield v. Lasher, 81 N. Y. 246; Morey v. Association, 123 N. Y. 207, 25 N. E. Rep. 161; Lothrop v. Adams, 133 Mass. 471; Willover v. Hill, 72 N. Y. 36.

The defendants introduced evidence tending to show that the plaintiff's reputation was that of a person having money under his control for the purpose of corrupting voters, and the plaintiff offered evidence tending to show the contrary. Upon this state of the evidence, the defendants requested the court to give the following instruction, which was refused: "In fixing the amount of damages, it is proper that you take into consideration the reputation of the plaintiff at and prior to the time of the alleged publication, as to the point wherein he claims to be damaged; and in case you find that plaintiff, prior to the publication, bore a bad reputation as to the point wherein he claims to be damaged, you may fix nominal damages only." The court did not err in refusing to thus instruct the jury. The defendants were entitled to an instruction, if they had requested it, that in fixing the amount of damages the jury might consider the previous character of the plaintiff, as they might believe it to be from the evidence. But the jury, even if they found the character of the plaintiff to be bad, could not be restricted to nominal damages in their verdict unless they believed that such damages would fully compensate the plaintiff for the wrong suffered by the publication of the matter alleged in the complaint, and that exemplary damages should not be given. Judgment and order affirmed.

REMY v. OLDS et al. (No. 18,114.)

CONTRACTS—ACTIONS ON—PLEADING—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A cause of action may be stated in different counts in order to meet any possible phase of the evidence, and the pleader will not be required to elect on which count he will proceed.

2. Where plaintiff, in an action for breach of contract, must show performance on his part before he can recover, nonperformance by him cannot be excused on the ground that it was caused by the act of God; and Civil Code, § 1511, providing that want of performance is excused "when it is prevented or delayed by irresistible superhuman cause," does not apply to such cases.

3. Where a contract requires a party to plant "grape vines," and the word "vines" does not appear to have been used in any special or local sense, expert evidence is not admissible to show its meaning, but it will be held to mean indifferently either cuttings or rooted plants, according to common usage.

4. In an action for breach of a contract to furnish water for irrigation, whereby a large number of grape cuttings planted by plaintiff died, testimony of a witness for defendants that he (witness) procured 15,000 cuttings from the lot from which plaintiff procured his, planted them on similar land, and watered and cared for them well, and yet nearly all of them died, though it relates to a collateral matter, is relevant, as tending to prove a fact from which it could be inferred that the loss of plaintiff's vines was not caused by defendants' failure to furnish water.

5. Where one of the issues in an action on a contract is as to whether there was such performance by plaintiff as would entitle him to recover, an instruction that, if the jury believe that defendants did not perform their part of the contract, they must find for plaintiff, is erroneous, as it takes from the jury the issue as to performance by plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Merced county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge Action by Thophile Remy against E. J. Olds and George H. Barfield for breach of contract. There was a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. W. Knox, for appellants. James F. Peck and T. C. Law, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Defendants take this appeal from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. This case has been here before. 88 Cal. 537, 26 Pac. Rep. 355. In the opinion on the first appeal the substance of the complaint and the contract sued on are fully stated. The answer denies the existence of the contract, but admits that such a contract was agreed upon, and avers that it was to have been reduced to writing and signed by all parties; that it was reduced to writing, signed and acknowledged by defendants, and sent to plaintiff, who was to sign, acknowledge, and have it recorded. This was October, 9, 1888. It appears that plaintiff did not then sign it, but had it recorded. Afterwards, on being informed that his signature was necessary, he did sign it, and had it re-recorded. Meantime he had taken possession of the land, and commenced performance. Defendants consented to his acts, believing that he had signed the contract, but, discovering that he had not done so, they notified him in writing in June, 1889, that they would not be bound by it, and considered him a trespasser on the land. Apparently, however, although that is not made very certain by the evidence, the plaintiff had executed it before the notice was given. Upon receiving the notice, plaintiff withdrew from the land, and commenced this action.

The complaint, as was said on the former appeal, contains two counts,—one for damages on the contract; and the other to recover materials furnished, money laid out and expended, and labor performed, all furnished and done under the contract, and in performance of it, before the notice from defendants. After a jury had been impaneled, defendants requested the court to require plaintiff to elect upon which count or cause of action he would rely, and that thereupon the other cause of action be dismissed. This the court refused to do, and the ruling is assigned as error. Conceding that this is a case in which the same cause of action is differently stated in two separate counts, still I think the ruling correct. The right to so plead is well established here. Wilson v. Smith, 61 Cal. 209; Katz v. Bedford, 77 Cal. 319, 19 Pac. Rep. 523; Leeke v. Hancock, 76 Cal. 127, 17 Pac. Rep. 937; and many earlier cases. Since it is allowable to state the cause of action in the alternate, using different counts in order to meet any possible phase of the evidence, a party cannot be deprived of the privilege by being compelled to strike out all causes of action save one before the trial commences. It would render the privilege a barren one. But the two causes of action here are not the same. The second count only enumerates other damage, not specially set out in the first count. Perhaps all should have been in the one count, but there can be no doubt of the right of plaintiff to join all in one suit, and he cannot be compelled to abandon any part of his claim.

The next point relates to the ruling admitting the contract in evidence on the ground that it had not been executed by plaintiff. The facts in regard to this have already been stated. This ruling was clearly correct. It is convenient to refer to the concise statement of the provisions of the contract in the opinion rendered on the last appeal. Plaintiff did not level and prepare the land in the fall of 1888, but claims that he did in the following February, and in March he set out grape cuttings upon lots 49 and 50, and also a nursery of about four acres for himself on lots 71 and 72. The vines nearly all died, as plaintiff maintains, because defendants did not furnish water for irrigation. Plaintiff seeks to recover as damages the cost of the cuttings and his labor in preparing the land and planting. To this claim on the part of plaintiff the defendants interpose several objections. (1) They contend that he cannot recover damages in a suit upon the contract because he has himself failed to perform his obligations under it, in that he did not plow, level, or prepare the land for planting in the fall of 1888. They contend and produce evidence in support of the proposition that, unless the land were plowed in the fall before the rains, it would not be in good condition for planting in the following spring. (2) That the vines were not properly planted, and would not have survived if water had been furnished. (3) That the vines, when planted, were not protected by a rabbit-tight inclosure, and that the rabbits gnawed the bark from the cuttings, and nibbled the buds, and prevented their growing. There was no evidence that rabbits did injure the vines, but there was that rabbits were very numerous there, and that protection against them was necessary to enable vines to grow as soon as planted. And (4) the cuttings were dead, or at least not suitable for the purpose when planted. Defendants also contend that they did furnish water as soon as it was required; if not on Hartley avenue, still, where it was equally convenient, and where plaintiff had consented to receive it. It was incumbent upon the plaintiff, since he seeks to recover upon the contract, to show full performance on his part, so far as he was not prevented from performing by defendants. He did not claim that he had plowed, leveled, or prepared the land in the fall, but he contended that the provision as to time was waived by defendants, and that they consented to his doing this work in February; also that the delay was excused because performance at the time was prevented by act of God, to wit, a heavy storm or fall of rain, which rendered the land unfit to be plowed in the fall.

Defendants objected to the evidence, (1) because the complaint avers that plaintiff had performed the contract as made and does not show an alteration; (2) in effect, though not so stated, because the act of God would not excuse delay. As to the first, it is enough to say that the position of plaintiff does not assume that there had been any alteration of the contract, but that the defendants agreed to accept what was done as performance. The contract as made was fully performed, if plaintiff is correct, though not at the time stipulated. But, regarding it as an alteration of the contract, it is evident that defendants have not been injured. As to the ruling permitting evidence that it was impossible to plow, level, and prepare the land in the fall of 1888, further consideration is necessary. The jury were also instructed upon this matter, and all may as well be considered together. Plaintiff, testifying in his own behalf, was proceeding to state that he attempted to plow, level, and prepare the land in October, when the rains came, and he could do no more. Defendants here objected that it was immaterial whether the rain rendered it impossible or not, when the court remarked, in the presence of the jury: "I would like to see the decision that, where the act of God prevents a man, because of that act of God he shall lose all of the results of his labor. Objection overruled." Upon the conclusion of the evidence, the jury was instructed as follows: "Time is of the essence of the contract in controversy in this action. This means that, unless every act meant to be done under the contract is done within the time therein stipulated, there is a breach of the contract by which-ever party fails so to perform, unless the time in which the act is to be done be waived, or such performance be impossible by the act of God, such as an unexpected storm." The first idea which suggests itself upon this matter is that a rain in the last days of October is not such an extraordinary event as will constitute an act of God excusing performance. It was a seasonable event, one which was likely to happen, and which common prudence would have provided for. Respondent, however, contends that this view is justified by section 1511, Civil Code. That is, in effect, that want of performance "or any delay therein is excused by the following causes to the extent to which they operate. * * * (2) When it is prevented or delayed by an irresistible superhuman cause," etc. I cannot think this section was intended to have any application to a case of this kind. The doctrine in relation to the act of God is more often invoked by insurers than by others, but is in a proper case matter of defense, where one is sued for failure to perform a contract. When, however, one sues upon a contract, and must show performance on his part to entitle him to recover, he cannot rely upon such prevention to show performance. Excuse for not performing, in the nature of things, cannot be performance. A defendant cannot be made to pay for the act of God preventing the plaintiff from rendering an equivalent for the money he seeks to recover. The provision cited from section 1511 cannot be construed as going beyond this. Properly understood, it announces a well-known rule of law, but pressed further it works a radical change in the rule. Besides, the view here taken is the natural and obvious meaning of the language employed. The statute purports simply to provide an excuse for failure to perform. Plaintiff might have relied entirely upon his claim that defendants had waived the matter of time, but did not. Under the circumstances, it is impossible to say that this evidence and the instruction did not have weight in convincing the jury that plaintiff was not in default when the notice was served. See section 1440, Civil Code.

Plaintiff set out on lots 49 and 50 grape cuttings or segments of grape vines, instead of rooted vines. Defendants contend that this was not a compliance with the contract, which calls for grape vines. They insist that a vine includes the root,—is an entire plant. Upon this subject expert testimony was admitted. It was also shown that vineyards were sometimes planted with cuttings and sometimes with rooted vines. Some witnesses thought the words "grape vines" necessarily meant a rooted vine, and some that it excluded the idea that the vine was rooted. The dictionaries give as the first meaning of the word "vine" a plant with a trailing or climbing stem, but they also apply the word to the trailing stem in contradistinction to the plant, and we all know that the word is so applied in common usage. As the words "grape vine" might mean either, and both are used in planting vineyards, I think plaintiff was at liberty under his contract to use either. It was proper to show how vineyards are planted, but, since the words were not used in any special or local sense, I think the meaning of the words was not a matter to be established by expert testimony.

Appellant complains of an order of the court striking out certain evidence given by Mitchell, a witness for defendants. The witness had stated that he procured some 15,000 cuttings from the lot from which plaintiff obtained his; that he set them out on land similar to lots 49 and 50, and in the vicinity; that his were well watered and cared for, and yet nearly all died; and was proceeding to specify the character and degree of care given them when he was interrupted by the court, who ordered the testimony stricken out, and instructed the jury not to regard it, saying that it was in regard to a matter entirely collateral, and had no bearing on the case. Counsel for the defense then stated that he had other testimony to the same point which he asked might be considered as offered, excluded, and exception noted. This was agreed to. That the evidence was upon a collateral issue is not conclusive against its relevancy. The question was whether the fact it tended to establish would tend to prove or disprove the fact at issue. Evidence is relevant not only when it tends to prove or disprove the precise fact in issue, but when it tends to establish a fact from which the existence or nonexistence of the fact in issue can be directly inferred. I think the evidence was relevant and material. Plaintiff claimed that his vines died for lack of water which defendants agreed to furnish, but did not. The evidence excluded tended to show that the vines would not have lived had water been furnished. If this were established, plaintiff could not recover the cost of vines set in lots 49 and 50, nor for his labor in setting them, nor damages for the loss of his nursery, which he claims he would have made had he been permitted to complete his contract. The probative force of the evidence was for the jury. Plaintiff was to furnish the grape vines.

The question as to the necessity for a rabbit-tight fence was probably sufficiently discussed on the former appeal. Of course, the rule is well established that in construing a contract a court is not only to take it by all its corners, but is to be placed in the seats of the parties when it was made. In other words, it is to be construed in the light and with the knowledge of surrounding circumstances. If circumstances were shown at the trial which did not appear in the complaint, in the light of which the court construed the contract on the former appeal, and which would justify a different construction, that ruling would not then constitute the law of the case. The court should now interpret the contract in the light of all the facts, and, so far as other facts throw light upon it, the court is not bound by the ruling based upon the allegations of the complaint in overruling the demurrer.

I think the court erred in its ruling in regard to evidence that a fall plowing of the land was necessary. The ruling and remark of the court went beyond the necessities of the case, and amounted to an instruction to the jury that plaintiff was entitled to a judgment unless defendants furnished water on Hartley avenue. The court said: "I will instruct the jury, if the defendants did not furnish water on Hartley avenue according to the contract, the plaintiff is entitled to damage for a breach of the contract. You will direct your evidence to that point." This took from the jury at once all consideration of the question as to whether plaintiff had failed to perform the conditions of the contract on his part. Indeed, the ruling prevented defendants from putting in proof upon the subject of the claim that plaintiff did not plow, level, or prepare the land in 1888, or to rebut evidence on the part of plaintiff that they had waived such performance. It also ignored the evidence given by defendant Olds to the effect that plaintiff had consented to the furnishing of water on Clinton avenue.

It is fair to say that the formal instructions do submit to the jury the question as to whether plaintiff was in default when the notice was served. The remark was not intended to have any bearing upon that question. Still apparently it did, and we cannot say that it did no injury to defendants. Some further questions are raised, but, I think, none which need discussion here. I think the order and judgment must be reversed, and a new trial had.

I concur: SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

HIBERNIA SAVINGS & LOAN SOC. OF SAN FRANCISCO v. WACKEN-
REUDER et al. (No. 14,185.)

CLAIMS AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATES—PRESENTATION—LIENS.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 1502, provides that, if an action is pending against a decedent, plaintiff must present his claim as in other cases. Section 1500 permits the bringing of actions to foreclose liens against property of the estate without prior presentation of claim, if recourse against other property is expressly waived in the complaint. Held, that a suit to foreclose a mortgage, pending when the death took place, might be prosecuted to judgment against the representatives and heirs on the conditions prescribed in the latter section.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. § 1500, requiring that, if the claim have not been presented, the complaint to foreclose a lien against property of the estate shall expressly waive recourse against other property, and forbidding recovery of counsel fees, a complaint containing such waiver, in the words of the statute, is not vitiated by a prayer for judgment for the amount due on the note and mortgage, for costs and counsel fees, and for a receiver to take charge of the real estate till the same be sold, and to hold the net income, to be applied to any deficiency after sale.

3. Defendant in foreclosure having died pending suit, the filing of a supplemental complaint, substituting the heirs and representatives, is not the commencement of a new action, as regards the statute of limitations; Code Civil Proc. § 385, providing that an action shall not abate by death of a party, but may be continued against his successor in interest, and the substitution of defendants is not the beginning of a new action.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society of San Francisco against Vitus Wackenreuder and Morris Windt to foreclose a mortgage. Wackenreuder having died, a supplemental complaint substituted his executors, heirs, and devisees as defendants, with one Reynolds, claimant of an interest in the land. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. Tobin and Thomas F. Barry, for appellant. T. Z. Blakeman and Geo. D. Shadbourne, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. This action was commenced on June 19, 1885, against Vitus Wackenreuder and Morris Windt, for the purpose of foreclosing a mortgage made by said Wackenreuder to secure the payment of his note which matured on June 29, 1882, and he was properly served with the summons; but for some reason, not disclosed by the record, the cause was not brought to a hearing in his lifetime. Wackenreuder died in August, 1887, and the time for presenting claims against his estate expired on April 11, 1889. The plaintiff did not present for allowance the claim which is the subject of this action. But on June 3, 1889, the court made an order substituting the executors of Wackenreuder as defendants in his place, and permitting the plaintiff to file "an amended and supplemental complaint," which it did on June 13, 1889. In the "amended and supplemental complaint," the executors of Wackenreuder and certain other persons, his heirs and devisees, and one Reynolds, who had made a bid for a portion of the property described in the mortgage, at a sale thereof under an order of the probate court, were named as defendants, and appeared and answered in the action. The supplemental complaint contained, in addition to the matters stated in the original, allegations of the death of Wackenreuder, and the appointment of his executors, who were named as defendants therein, and that the other persons who were named as defendants therein claimed an interest in the property mortgaged, and also contained the following waiver: "The plaintiff hereby expressly waives all recourse against any other property of the estate of said Vitus Wackenreuder, deceased, other than that which is included and embraced in, and covered by, said mortgage." The superior court found, upon the foregoing facts, that plaintiff's cause of action, as stated in the supplemental complaint, was barred by the provisions of sections 1493 and 1502 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and was also barred, as to the heirs, by sections 312 and 337 of the same Code, and thereupon gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff claims that these findings are against the evidence, and this is the only question presented by the appeal.

1. Sections 1493 and 1502 of the Code of Civil Procedure are as follows: "Sec. 1493. All claims arising upon contracts, whether the same be due, not due, or contingent, must be presented within the time limited in the notice, and any claim not so presented is barred forever. * * *" "Sec. 1502. If an action is pending against the decedent at the time of his death, the plaintiff must in like manner present his claim to the executor or administrator, for allowance or rejection, authenticated as required in other cases; and no recovery shall be had in the action unless proof be made of the presentations required." The defendants insist that, as this action was pending at the date of the death of Wackenreuder, and as plaintiff has never presented to the executors of deceased, for allowance, its claim upon the note and mortgages sued on, the case is brought fully within the provisions of section 1502 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

This argument is based upon the assumption that the section referred to applies to all actions pending against a defendant at the date of his death, and this would be its proper construction if there were no other sections of the Code to be considered than sections 1493 and 1502. But, by section 1500 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is provided that: "No holder of any claim against an estate shall maintain any action thereon unless the claim is first presented to the executor or administrator, except in the following case: An action may be brought by any holder of a mortgage or lien to enforce the same against the property of the estate subject thereto, where all recourse against any other property of the estate is expressly waived in the complaint, but no counsel fees shall be recovered in such action unless such claim be so presented." Under this section, when the waiver therein provided for is made, claims secured by mortgage (other than a mortgage upon the homestead, which, by section 1475 of the Code of Civil Procedure, must be presented for allowance) are excepted from the operation of section 1493, requiring the presentation of claims to the executor or administrator for allowance; and, by necessary implication, actions upon such excepted claims are not affected by the general rule contained in section 1502 of the same Code. The latter section, when properly construed, refers only to actions upon such claims as are required to be presented to the administrator for allowance under section 1475 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or by the provisions of section 1493 of the same Code, as modified by section 1500. In other words, section 1502 of the Code of Civil Procedure simply means that, when an action is pending against a decedent at the time of his death, the plaintiff therein is not relieved from the duty of presenting for allowance the claim upon which it is based, when the claim is of that character that he would have been required to make such presentation in order to preserve its validity as a claim against the estate if such action had not been brought in the lifetime of the decedent. It is quite true that the language of section 1500 of the Code of Civil Procedure, permitting the holder of the mortgage or lien to maintain an action thereon without presentation of the claim to the executor or administrator of an estate, if construed literally, would only apply to an action to foreclose a mortgage or lien when commenced after the death of the mortgagor; but there is no distinction in reason between such an action commenced at such a time, and one which was brought for the same purpose in the lifetime of the mortgagor, and which is pending at the date of his death, and the section should not be construed as making any such distinction. Like all remedial statutes, it should not be confined to cases falling within its exact letter, but it should be given effect according to its reason and spirit. The object of this section is not only to give to the holder of such a mortgage, or other lien, the right to maintain an action against the representative of the estate, to enforce the same, without presentation of the claim upon which the action is founded, when the waiver provided for is made, but also to relieve the estate from the payment of counsel fees stipulated for in the mortgage, and from the payment of any deficiency judgment, when the mortgagee elects to proceed under it; and this purpose or intention of the law is as fully satisfied when the complaint in an action pending in the lifetime of the decedent is, after his death, so amended as to secure this benefit to the estate of the deceased, as it would be by dismissing such pending action, and commencing a new one, and thus bringing the case within the literal terms of the statute. In holding, as we do, that section 1502 of the Code of Civil Procedure has no application to an action which, if brought against the administrator or executor in the first instance, could have been maintained without first presenting to such administrator or executor for allowance the claim upon which it is based, our conclusion is not in conflict with anything decided in Bollinger v. Manning, 79 Cal. 7, 21 Pac. Rep. 375. That was an action to foreclose a mortgage upon a homestead selected by the deceased in his lifetime. By the express provision of section 1475 of the Code of Civil Procedure, such claim is required to be presented for allowance, and is not within the provisions of section 1500 of the same Code, which permits a mortgage to be foreclosed without such presentation when recourse against all other property of the estate is waived; and the court held that the fact that such action was pending in the lifetime of the deceased did not exempt the plaintiff from the duty of presenting such claim to the representative of the estate, but that section 1502 of the Code of Civil Procedure applied to such a case, and would permit no recovery in the pending action unless the claim was presented as required by law. The distinction between that case and this is broad, and the decision there is in entire harmony with all that is said in this opinion.

2. It is also claimed by respondents that the plaintiff did not, in its supplemental complaint, make the waiver required by section 1500 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that for this reason the judgment should be affirmed. This argument is based upon the fact that in the prayer for relief the plaintiff asks for judgment for "the amount due upon the said note and mortgage," and for costs "and counsel fees," and "that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the real estate until the same be sold, and collect the rents, and hold the net income therefrom, to be applied to the payment of any deficiency which may remain due to plaintiff after said sale." It must be conceded that the prayer of the complaint is carelessly drawn, but we do not think that this should be allowed to destroy the effect of the express waiver which is contained in the body of the complaint, and which is in the exact language of the statute, and therefore sufficient.

3. It is lastly claimed by respondents that the action is barred by section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which requires an action upon a written contract to be brought within four years after the cause of action thereon accrues. This contention cannot be sustained, in view of the facts appearing in the record. The note which is sued on matured June 29, 1882, and the action was commenced June 19, 1885, which was less than three years after the maturity of the note. The contention of respondents that if the action was not pending at the date of the death of Wackenreuder, within the meaning of section 1502 of the Code of Civil Procedure, then the filing of the supplemental complaint on June 13, 1889, is to be treated as the commencement of a new action, is fallacious. The action was commenced within the time fixed by section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and did not abate upon the death of Wackenreuder, but was continued against his representatives by the order of the court substituting them as defendants in his place; and the subsequent filing of an amended or supplemental complaint, in which the plaintiff waived its right to resort to any other property than that mortgaged in satisfaction of the judgment which it demanded, and which waiver was also, in effect, a waiver of its right to the counsel fees stipulated for in the mortgage, was not the introduction of a new and different cause of action against such representatives, or the other persons named as defendants in the supplemental complaint, who are heirs and successors of the deceased mortgagor. The filing of such supplemental or amended complaint was authorized by section 385 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that an action shall not abate by the death of a party, and that the same may be continued against his representative or successor in interest, and the bringing in of such substituted defendants is not the commencement of a new action against them, but only a step in the progress of the original action to judgment. Evans v. Nealis, 69 Ind. 148; Evans v. Cleveland, 72 N. Y. 486. In the case last cited, the original plaintiff died, and his executrix was substituted as plaintiff therein by the filing of a supplemental complaint, by leave of the court. The supplemental complaint was not filed for more than one year after the original cause of action accrued, and, if the supplemental complaint was to be treated as the commencement of a new action, the cause of action therein stated was barred by the statute of limitations of that state, and this was the contention of the defendant there; but the court held otherwise, saying: "It was provided in the old Code (section 121) that no action should abate by the death of a party, but that it might be continued in the name of the personal representative or successor in interest by motion made at any time within a year, or afterward, by supplemental complaint. The service of such complaint was not the commencement of a new action. It was a proceeding in an action which had been commenced, and which was then pending. The action had been commenced within the year after the cause of action accrued, and it is impossible to perceive how any lapse of time, subsequent to the commencement of the action, could bar the action under a statute, which prescribes a limit of time only before the commencement of the action." This reasoning is entirely applicable to the facts of this case, and fully supports our conclusion that the filing of the supplemental complaint in this action was not the commencement of a new action, and that, the original action having been commenced within the time limited by section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the cause of action stated in the supplemental complaint is not barred by the provisions of that section. Judgment and order reversed.

HOPPE et al. v. HOPPE et al. (No. 18,225.)

SUPERSEDEAS—SALE OF REALTY

Under Code Civil Proc. § 945, providing that, when the judgment appealed from directs the sale of land, execution cannot be stayed without a bond on the part of appellant against waste, supersedeas cannot be granted on the mere bond for costs on appeal, nor on an application filed after the land has been actually sold under the judgment.

Department 1.

Partition by Herman W. Hoppe and others against Julia Hoppe and W. A. Fountain, consolidated with suit by said Fountain against Julia Hoppe to foreclose a mortgage on the same land. Judgment for Fountain. Plaintiffs in partition, having appealed, apply for supersedeas. Motion denied.

Armstrong & Platnauer and Henry C. Ross, for petitioners. Clinton L. White, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Application for a writ of supersedeas. The above-named plaintiffs, claiming to be the owners of an undivided interest in certain lands, brought an action in partition against the defendants, Julia Hoppe and W. A. Fountain, alleging that the latter held a mortgage upon the land, executed to him by his codefendant, Julia. Fountain also brought an action against Julia to foreclose his mortgage, and thereafter, by an order of court, the two actions were consolidated. The court sustained defendant's demurrer to the claim of the petitioners for the partition of the land, and rendered judgment in his favor against Julia for a foreclosure of his mortgage and a sale of the land. This judgment does not refer to the claim for partition, but is limited to the claim on the mortgage, and it does not appear that the determination of the court upon the partition claim has passed into a judgment. From this judgment separate appeals have been taken, one by the petitioners herein, and one by the defendant Julia.

By the terms of the judgment appealed from, a receiver is appointed, who is directed to make sale of the mortgaged premises, and out of the proceeds of said sale to pay the amount of the plaintiffs' mortgage claim, and report the deficiency, if any, to the court. The defendant is also directed to deliver immediate possession of the premises to the said receiver, who is also directed to retain possession thereof until a redemption from said sale shall be made, or until the time for such redemption has expired, and thereupon to execute a deed to the purchaser. Upon this judgment an order of sale was issued to the receiver, and, after he had advertised the land for sale, the plaintiffs in the partition suit gave notice that they would apply to this court for a stay of proceedings pending the appeal. Before the day noticed for the hearing, the receiver had, however, sold the land in accordance with the directions of the judgment, for the amount of the mortgage claim, by which the judgment was satisfied. Section 945, Code Civil Proc., provides: "If the judgment or order appealed from direct the sale or delivery of possession of real property, the execution of the same cannot be stayed, unless a written undertaking be executed on the part of the appellant, with two or more sureties, to the effect that during the possession of such property by the appellant he will not commit, or suffer to be committed, any waste thereon." The undertaking given by the appellants in the present case is only the ordinary $300 bond for costs of appeal, and makes no provision against the commission of waste. The object of a supersedeas is to stay proceedings "in the court below upon the judgment appealed from," and to suspend the enforcement of that judgment until the appeal has been determined. Dulin v. Coal Co., (Cal.) 33 Pac. Rep. 123. If, however, the judgment has been executed, there is no further action to be taken thereon by the court below, and consequently nothing upon which the supersedeas can act. It follows, therefore, that the undertaking on appeal was insufficient to operate as a stay of proceedings, and that, even if it had been sufficient therefor, the petitioners did not make their application in time to have any order of this court effective, and their motion is therefore denied.

HAWKINS et al. v. MOREHEAD et al.
(No. 18,129.)

APPEAL—RECORD—EVIDENCE.

The sufficiency of testimony contained in a transcript on appeal, unaccompanied by a certificate that it was given or is correctly stated, will not be considered.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; John C. Gray, Judge.

Action by William Hawkins and others against A. A. Morehead and others. From a judgment for defendant Morehead, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. H. Schooler, for appellants. Park Henshaw, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover the value of certain materials furnished by the plaintiffs to the defendant Stauffer, and by him used in the construction of a house for the defendant Morehead, upon a lot of land owned by her, and to enforce a lien therefor on the said house and lot. The court below found, among other things: "That the amount agreed to be paid said contractor, Stauffer, for the erection of said house, was less than one thousand dollars; that defendant Morehead had paid Stauffer in full when the said claim of lien was filed, and that there was nothing due or owing to said Stauffer at said date; that no written notice of any kind was given said Morehead by plaintiffs that they had furnished material or labor, either or both, to said Stauffer for said building; that said building was completed and occupied by a tenant on the 3d day of October, 1891, and that more than thirty days had elapsed after the completion of said contract and building before plaintiffs filed for record with the county recorder their claim of lien." And as conclusions of law the court found that plaintiffs were entitled to a judgment against Stauffer for the amount demanded, but were not entitled to have the same enforced as a lien on the said premises. Judgment was accordingly entered that the plaintiffs take nothing against defendant Morehead, and that she recover from them her costs. From this judgment in favor of defendant Morehead plaintiffs have appealed, and the case is brought here without any statement or bill of exceptions. The transcript contains nearly 50 pages of printed matter, purporting to be testimony given at the trial, but not accompanied by any certificate that it was in fact given, or is correctly stated.

It is argued for appellants that the findings were not justified by the evidence, and in support of this position numerous references are made to the testimony found in the transcript. The trouble with this argument is that the supposed testimony cannot be looked at or regarded here for any purpose. The rule has been too long settled to admit of discussion that the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or decision can only be considered on appeal when the evidence is brought up in a statement or bill of exceptions, properly certified. The only question then left to be determined is, does the judgment roll show error? We do not think it does. The findings follow the pleadings, and fully support the judgment. See Lumber Co. v. Cummings, 86 Cal. 22, 24 Pac. Rep. 814. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

DE ARNAZ v. JAYNES et al. (No. 19,138.)

NOTICE OF APPEAL—ON WHOM SERVED—DEFENDANT CONSENTING TO JUDGMENT.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage, the owners of two-thirds of the property alleged that plaintiff, as mortgagee, had been in possession and received certain rents and profits, and prayed for an accounting. A demurrer to this answer having been sustained, judgment was rendered against such owners, and they appealed. The owner of the other third interest consented to judgment for plaintiff, the latter having waived a deficiency judgment. The mortgage debt bore interest at 8 per cent., and the judgment at 7. Held, that notice of appeal must be served on the owner of the one-third interest, since he would be injuriously affected by a reversal of the judgment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by Jose de Arnaz against James Jaynes, Joseph Moffatt, I. B. Conkling, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the three named defendants appeal. Dismissed.

M. W. Conkling, for appellants. Lee & Scott, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This is an appeal from a judgment foreclosing a mortgage. Appellants Jaynes, Moffatt, and Conkling, and J. M. Taylor, Andrew Stephens, and others, were made defendants. The mortgage was executed February 3, 1887, by appellant Moffatt and one H. Clay Graham, since deceased, to secure their two joint and several promissory notes for the aggregate sum of $20,540, with interest at 8 per cent.

per annum, payable semiannually, and if not paid, to bear interest at the same rate. Andrew Stephens was a lessee of the mortgaged property, and answered, setting up his interest. J. M. Taylor answered, alleging that he is the owner of an undivided two-thirds of the mortgaged premises, subject to the lien of the mortgage, and consenting that plaintiff be granted the relief prayed for in his complaint, including the appointment of a receiver. Defendants Jaynes, Moffatt, and Conkling (the appellants here) answered, admitting that no payments had been made upon the mortgage, and alleging that from December 1, 1887, to November 17, 1891, defendant Taylor owned an undivided two-thirds of the mortgaged property, and they the remaining one-third; that during the time above mentioned the plaintiff, as mortgagee, was in possession of the mortgaged premises, and received the rents and profits of the same, of the value of $5,000, which should have been applied upon the mortgage; and prayed for an accounting. Plaintiff demurred to this answer. The demurrer was sustained, and, defendants declining to amend, judgment went against them. Of all the defendants, Moffatt was the only one personally liable for the mortgage debt; and plaintiff, in his complaint and in the judgment, waived a deficiency judgment, except as to the funds in the hands of the receiver. The notice of appeal was served only upon the plaintiff, and he, as respondent here, now insists that the appeal should be dismissed because of appellants' failure to serve the notice of appeal upon defendants Taylor and Stephens, both of whom, he contends, would be affected by a reversal of the judgment.

There was no personal judgment against any of the defendants, for a deficiency or otherwise, but there was a judgment against the whole of the property, and to which Taylor is a necessary party. If the judgment should be reversed, Taylor would necessarily be a party to further proceedings, else his interest in the mortgaged premises would not be foreclosed. Respondent suggests that as the mortgage debt bears interest at 8 per cent., compounded semiannually, while the judgment bears but 7 per cent., Taylor would necessarily be injuriously affected, since the amount for which his property would be liable would be increased. On the other hand, appellants contend that plaintiff should be required to account for the rents and profits, as alleged in their answer, and that such accounting would diminish the amount for which Taylor's interest would be liable, and that, therefore, he would be benefited. But this must depend upon their success in compelling an accounting, and the amount for which the plaintiff may be required to account. Taylor, having consented to the judgment, could not appeal, and is therefore conclusively presumed to be satisfied therewith. What his reasons were for so consenting, we can only conjecture. It may be that he hoped, by having a prompt disposition of the case, and an early sale,—thus preventing a continued accumulation of interest,—that there might be a surplus to be distributed among the owners. It is just as essential that Taylor should be a party to proceedings in the appellate court, which necessarily affect him or his interests, as that he should be a party to the proceedings in the court below. In Senter v. De Bernal, 38 Cal. 640, it was said: "Every party whose interest in the subject-matter of the appeal is adverse to, or will be affected by, the reversal or modification of the judgment or order from which the appeal has been taken, is, we think, an adverse party, within the meaning of these provisions of the Code, irrespective of the question whether he appears upon the face of the record in the attitude of a plaintiff or defendant or intervener." There the action was for partition. The court further said: "From the interlocutory judgment upon such issues, appeals may be taken by the party aggrieved, without making any persons parties to the appeal, except such as were parties to the issues; but no appeal from the whole of the final judgment can be made effectual unless all the parties to it are made parties to the appeal, either as appellants or respondents, for such a judgment cannot be reversed without affecting the interest of all who are parties to it." See, also, in re Castle Dome Min. & Smelting Co., 79 Cal. 248, 21 Pac. Rep. 746; Millikin v. Houghton, 75 Cal. 540, 17 Pac. Rep. 641; Williams v. Association, 66 Cal. 194, 5 Pac. Rep. 85; O'Kane v. Daly, 63 Cal. 318. Of course, all the cases concede that, if the omitted party would not be affected by a reversal or modification of the judgment appealed from, the appeal will be sustained; but this, I think, is as far as the court has gone, or could go, in any case. The appellate court having no jurisdiction to enter a judgment which would necessarily affect one not a party to the appeal, the other questions presented cannot be examined. I advise that the appeal herein be dismissed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the appeal is dismissed.

99 Cal. 538.

CITY OF SANTA ANA v. HARLIN. (No. 19,030.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—NECESSITY—PUBLIC USE—COMPENSATION—EVIDENCE—WITNESS—EXPERTS—PLEADING AND PROOF—APPEAL.

1. As Acts 1889, p. 70, giving the city council power to open streets, imposes on it the duty of determining the necessity, and makes the official order opening the street conclusive evidence of the necessity, the question of necessity is purely for the council, and will not be passed upon by the courts.

2. The mere fact that individuals subscribed money or gave bond to a city to contribute to the expense of laying out a street will not vitiate the proceedings, or prove that the land was taken for the accommodation of private persons, and not for a public use.

3. In proceedings to condemn land, the present market value is the measure of damages, and not its value in use to the owner or to those seeking to condemn.

4. The term "present market value" of land means the price he could obtain after such a reasonable and ample time to sell as would ordinarily be taken by an owner.

5. In condemnation proceedings, a question: "For what purpose could that property be used properly?"—is properly disallowed.

6. In condemnation proceedings the owner is entitled to show the adaptability of the land to the different practical purposes to which it is naturally adapted, but the proof should be limited to showing the present condition of the property, and the uses to which it is adapted, and not extended to speculative inquiries as to possible future uses under altered circumstances.

7. In condemnation proceedings the owner cannot show offers received for the property. Muller v. Railway Co., 23 Pac. Rep. 265, 83 Cal. 240, distinguished.

8. Even if the owner could testify as to offers received for property sought to be condemned, a question whether he received offers was properly excluded, where no time was specified, and he had just testified that he had owned the property for 16 years.

9. The extent of cross-examination to test the knowledge, judgment, or bias of a witness is within the discretion of the trial court.

10. Witnesses testifying as to the market value of land need not be experts in the severe sense of the term, provided they show sufficient knowledge and experience as to values of land in the neighborhood.

11. An objection to the exclusion of evidence will not be considered on appeal, where the statement does not show in what it consisted.

12. Evidence only tending to establish part of an answer which has been stricken out is properly excluded.

13. In an action to condemn land for a street, evidence of irregularities in the proceedings to open the street is properly excluded where irregularities are not alleged in the answer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Action by the city of Santa Ana against T. J. Harlin to condemn land for a street. From the judgment therein defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. E. Keech, for appellant. Z. B. West and James G. Scarborough, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. The action was brought by the city of Santa Ana, a municipal corporation, to condemn a right of way over certain land of the defendant for the opening of Second street in said city. The cause was tried by a jury, and the damages assessed at $267, for which sum judgment was entered in favor of defendant, as well as a decree that the use of the land for the purposes of a street was a public use, and the taking thereof necessary to such use. The appeal is from this judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The final order of condemnation had not been made when the appeal was perfected.

The first error assigned is founded upon an order of the court striking out from defendant's answer certain allegations to the effect that the action is instituted upon the motion and at the request and for the benefit of the Santa Ana & Westminster Railroad Company, a corporation, for the purpose and benefit of said railroad company. Mahoney v. Waterworks Co., 52 Cal. 159, and Dill. Mun. Corp. (3d Ed.) § 596, (461,) are relied upon in support of the alleged error. Under the act of March 6, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 70,) the power to order the opening of streets in municipalities, and the method of its exercise, is conferred upon the city council or legislative department of the municipality. Provision is made whereby those interested and objecting to the improvement and to various of the measures for carrying it out may be heard and their objections passed upon by the council; and when the several steps provided by the statute have been taken, and the resolution and ordinance ordering said work have been regularly adopted, the action of the council is final and conclusive of the necessity of the improvement, and the courts may not adjudicate the question of such necessity in an action or proceeding for condemnation of lands necessary to the improvement. See St. 1889, p. 75, § 18; Tehama Co. v. Bryan, 68 Cal. 57, 8 Pac. Rep. 673; Butte Co. v. Boydston, 11 Pac. Rep. 781, (not officially reported); City and County of San Francisco v. Kiernan, (Cal.) 33 Pac. Rep. 720. The question sought to be raised by the portion of defendant's answer stricken out was one going to the public character of the use and the necessity for its establishment, and as such was properly solvable by the city council. It follows that the court did not err in striking out that portion of the answer. City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. Rep. 604.

After the resolution of intention passed by the city council, declaring its intention to open and extend Second street, and the ordinance or resolution providing for the proposed work, were introduced in evidence, and plaintiff had rested its case, defendant offered in evidence all the proceedings and records in the matter of opening Second street, for the alleged purpose of proving: (1) That the jurisdictional facts required by section 6 of the act of March 6, 1889, had not been proven, and did not exist. (2) That there was no street superintendent; that none was ever appointed; that the person attempted to be appointed was not eligible, and did not qualify, and that he was at the time of the attempted appointment and pretended service a member of the board of trustees of the city of Santa Ana. (3) That no publication of notice was ever made, as required by section 3 of said act. Objection was made to the introduction of the record evidence, and sustained by the court, and the ruling is assigned as error. The statement fails to show in what the proffered evidence consisted, and, in the absence of all information as to the contents or character of the evidence offered, we cannot say whether it was material or pertinent to any issue in the case. Error must be shown, and, in the absence of all showing, will not be presumed. The bonds of Humphreys and Head, offered in evidence for the purpose of proving that the obligors were bound to pay the expense of opening the street, were properly excluded, as not within the issues. If they established anything in the case, it was that portion of the answer which had been stricken out. The mere fact that individuals have subscribed money or given a bond to a city to contribute towards the expense of laying out a street will not vitiate the proceedings, or prove that the land was taken for the accommodation of private persons, and not for public uses. Parks v. Boston, 8 Pick. 218; Copeland v. Packard, 16 Pick. 217; Stilson v. Board of Com'rs, 52 Ind. 213. There is no doubt that in many instances of attempted taking of private property for public uses, it devolves upon the courts to determine whether or not the use is a public use. Consolidated Channel Co. v. Central Pac. R. Co., 51 Cal. 269; Varick v. Smith, 5 Paige, 159; Loan Ass'n v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 655. These, however, are exceptions to a general rule which recognizes in the legislative department the source of the power to determine what shall be held to be a public use, and the action of the legislature on the question is not, except in extreme cases, open to review by the courts. Napa Valley R. Co. v. Napa Co., 30 Cal. 437. That the use of land for public streets in an incorporated town is a public use is true beyond controversy. And when, as under the statute of March 6, 1889, the duty of determining the necessity for opening such streets, and where, as under that statute, the official declaration or order opening a street is made conclusive evidence of the necessity therefor, the field of inquiry, in proceedings for the condemnation of land for such purposes, is confined to comparatively narrow limits. The answer contains no allegations of any defect or irregularity in the proceedings, and hence there was no issue under which such evidence was admissible. The case of Los Angeles Co. v. San Jose Land & Water Co., 96 Cal. 93, 30 Pac. Rep. 969, involved a like principle with that urged by appellant here, although under a different statute.

The next error assigned relates to the exclusion of evidence offered by defendant to show the uses and purposes to which the land proposed to be taken could properly be applied. In proceedings for the condemnation of land the present market value of the land is the measure of damages, and not its value in use to the owner or to the parties seeking to condemn it. By the term "present market value" is meant not what the owner could realize at a forced sale, but "the price that he could obtain after reasonable and ample time, such as would ordinarily be taken by an owner to make sale of like property." Railway Co. v. Woodruff, 49 Ark. 390, 5 S. W. Rep. 792. In Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, it was said: "The inquiry in such cases must be, what is the property worth in the market, viewed not merely with reference to the uses to which it is at the time applied, but with reference to the uses to which it is plainly adapted?—that is to say, what it is worth from its availability for valuable uses." Again, the court says: "As a general thing, we should say that the compensation to the owner is to be estimated by reference to the uses for which the property is suitable, having regard to the existing business or wants of the community, or such as may be reasonably expected in the immediate future." The peculiar fitness of land for particular purposes is an element in estimating its value which may be shown, and, when it appears, forms a factor in solving the problem of market value. Town Co. v. Neale, 78 Cal. 63, 20 Pac. Rep. 372; Id., 88 Cal. 50, 25 Pac. Rep. 977; Water-Works v. Drinkhouse, 92 Cal. 528, 28 Pac. Rep. 681. One of the questions ruled as inadmissible was the following: "For what purpose could that property be used properly?" No doubt the land in question could be properly used for a great variety of purposes, but it is not perceived that such fact would enlighten a jury upon the question of its value. Whether or not it was adapted to and peculiarly suited for some specific purpose is quite a different proposition, and testimony was introduced in reference to its qualities, location, surroundings, etc., all of which was proper. The following question was asked by defendant: "What are the characteristics or qualities of the land, Mr. Palmer, that render it suitable for a courthouse?" Similar questions, tending to draw out testimony showing the adaptation of the land for a college, and for the purpose of a school, etc., were put, and ruled out on the objection of plaintiff, and the rulings are assigned as error. I am of opinion the court erred in some of these rulings. The rule as enunciated by Lewis on Eminent Domain, at section 479, is as follows: "The conclusion from the authorities and reason of the matter seems to be that witnesses should not be allowed to give their opinions as to the value of property for a particular purpose, but should state its market value in view of any purpose to which it is adapted. The condition of the property and all its surroundings may be shown, and its availability for any particular use. If it has a peculiar adaptation for certain uses, this may be shown; and, if such peculiar adaptation adds to its value, the owner is entitled to the benefit of it. But when all the facts and circumstances have been shown, the question at last is, what is it worth in the market?" It will be seen from the foregoing quotation, which is regarded as a correct exposition of the law on the subject, that as to some of the questions seeking to elicit the value of the property for a specific purpose the rulings of the court below were correct. It should, however, it is thought, have permitted a full and free investigation as to the adaptability of the land to the varied practical purposes to which it is naturally adapted. Railroad Co. v. Pearson, 35 Cal. 247. Such proof should be limited to showing the present condition of the property, and the uses to which it is adapted, and may not be extended to speculative inquiries as to possible future uses under altered circumstances, which may or may not arise.

There was no error in the ruling of the court excluding an answer to the following question, propounded to defendant when testifying as a witness in his own behalf: "Question. Have you ever received offers for this real estate property?" The witness had just testified that he owned the land described in the pleadings, and had resided there 16 years. The question as to whether he had received offers for the property was, in effect, to ask him if he had received such offers at any time in 16 years. The general rule in estimating the market value of property is that "it is not competent for the owner to prove what he has been offered for his property, (Railroad Co. v. Pearson, 35 Cal. 247,) or what persons who have been looking for similar property were willing to give for it," (Railroad Co. v. Keith, 53 Ga. 178; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 446. See, also, Water-Works v. Drinkhouse, 92 Cal. 528, 28 Pac. Rep. 681. A case apparently at variance with the general line of decisions is to be found in Muller v. Railway Co., 83 Cal. 240, 23 Pac. Rep. 265, in which the court held a similar question admissible, saying: "Bona fide offers for property afford some test as to its value, and are, we think, admissible," quoting Harrison v. Glover, 72 N. Y. 451. The case quoted was not in relation to the market price of land, but related to a subject so different as to lend no support to the case there under discussion. If the doctrine of Muller v. Railway Co. can be upheld, it must be only as an exception to a general rule applicable only in peculiar cases, of which the present is not one. Again, if the binding force of Muller v. Railway Co. be admitted, the question put to defendant was improper, in not confining the witness to a period near the time at which the value was to be ascertained.

Upon cross-examination, where great latitude is allowed for the purpose of testing witnesses, questions of this character are conceded on all hands to be allowable. The questions put upon cross-examination of defendant's witnesses and objected to were proper. Great liberality is properly extended in such cross-examinations; and for the purpose of testing the knowledge, judgment, or bias of the witness the liberality is wisely exercised. In such cases, and for such purposes, much must be left to the discretion of the trial court, and it is only for an abuse of discretion that its action should be impugned. The witnesses Pinther, Ames, and Blee should have been allowed to testify as to the market value of the property. They were not experts in the severe sense of the term, but showed such knowledge and experience as to values of land in that neighborhood as entitled the defendant to their opinions. Railroad Co. v. Bunnell, 81 Pa. St. 426; Robertson v. Knapp, 35 N. Y. 92; Railroad Co. v. Hawk, 39 Kan. 638, 18 Pac. Rep. 943; Shattuck v. Railroad Co., 6 Allen, 117; People v. Sanford, 43 Cal. 32; Town Co. v. Neale, 78 Cal. 77, 20 Pac. Rep. 372. For the errors indicated the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

HARRISON and DE HAVEN, JJ. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PATERSON, J. I concur, and recommend to the court below for its guide the decision in Town Co. v. Neale, 88 Cal. 50, 25 Pac. Rep. 977, where the whole subject was carefully considered by this court in bank.

In re SHORTRIDGE. (No. 15,288.)

NEWSPAPERS—PUBLISHING TESTIMONY—CONTEMPT.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 125, providing that in certain actions the court may direct the trial of any issue of fact to be private, and exclude all persons except the officers of the court, the parties, their witnesses, and counsel, does not authorize the court in such a case to forbid publication of the testimony.

2. The finding that a publication was an unlawful interference with the proceedings of the court, within Code Civil Proc. § 1209, defining contempts, is not conclusive on certiorari, where it appears that the publication could not possibly have had that effect.

In bank. Certiorari to superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Contempt proceedings against Charles M. Shortridge, publisher of the San Jose Mercury, for publishing certain testimony in disobedience to an order of court. Judgment of guilty. Shortridge brings certiorari. Reversed.

John E. Richards, Samuel M. Shortridge, and D. M. Delmas, for petitioner. Frs. E. Spencer, D. W. Burchard, and N. Bowden, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. When the case of Price v. Price—an action for divorce—was called for trial in the superior court of Santa Clara county, the court was advised that the evidence would probably be of a filthy nature, and thereupon made an order directing "that during the trial all persons be excluded from the court room except the officers of the court, the parties, and their counsel." It was further ordered "that no public report or publication of any character of the testimony in the case be made." On the following day the petitioner herein caused to be published in the San Jose Mercury, a newspaper of which he was the editor and publisher, an article referring to the order of the court and containing what purported to be the testimony of the witnesses. Upon an affidavit setting forth the facts stated, the court made an order commanding Shortridge to appear and show cause why he should not be adjudged guilty of contempt. Mr. Shortridge, in his answer and at the hearing, disclaimed any intention to reflect upon the court or show any disrespect therefor, and claimed that in publishing a fair and true report of the testimony and proceedings he was simply exercising a constitutional right with which the court could not interfere by order or otherwise. Thereafter an opinion was filed showing that the learned judges of the court, sensible of the delicate position they occupied in determining the scope of their own judicial powers, had given the subject most careful consideration, and holding it to be their duty, in support of the honor of the state and the dignity of the court, to punish the respondent for violating the order. A judgment was entered adjudging Shortridge guilty of contempt of court, and ordering him to pay a fine of $100. Thereupon the petitioner herein applied for a writ of certiorari, which was granted, and, the matter having been heard and submitted, we are now called upon to determine whether the court exceeded its jurisdiction in adjudging the petitioner guilty of contempt on the facts stated. In support of the order under consideration, counsel for respondent rely upon two propositions, namely: First, that the order was authorized by sections 125, 1209, subsecs. 5, 9, Code Civil Proc.; and, second, that the publication was an interference with judicial proceedings which the court had the inherent power to punish as a contempt.

1. The sections referred to read as follows: "Sec. 125. In an action for divorce, criminal conversation, seduction or breach of promise of marriage, the court may direct the trial of any issue of fact joined therein to be private, and may exclude all persons except the officers of the court, the parties, their witnesses and counsel; provided that in any cause the court may, in the exercise of a sound discretion during the examination of a witness, exclude any or all other witnesses in the cause." "Sec. 1209. The following acts or omissions, in respect to a court of justice or proceedings therein, are contempts of the authority of the court: * * * (5) Disobedience of any lawful judgment, order or process of the court. * * * (9) Any other unlawful interference with the process or proceedings of a court." It may be well to note that petitioner was not a party, a witness, or an officer of the court, and that no order was made excluding the witnesses from the court room. The question, therefore, whether a witness, party, officer, or other person over whom the court has acquired jurisdiction may be punished for disclosing testimony when the trial is had with closed doors, and the question whether it is a contempt for a newspaper to publish the evidence after an order has been made excluding the witnesses from the court room during the trial, must be eliminated from the consideration of the case. The court planted its conclusion squarely upon the ground that "the evident purpose of the act was that in cases of divorce * * * the entire evidence should not be produced before the public," saying: "Of course, the main purpose of this enactment was to promote public morals. * * * How the public morals can be promoted by detailing to the world the testimony in low and filthy divorce cases, or blazoning forth the injuries that some poor, unfortunate girl may have suffered, or by heralding the connection of good and respectable and moral people where they are unfortunately and unwillingly as witnesses, is something that the court cannot understand, and which the legislature unquestionably intended to prohibit. * * * It is the disposition of every man to protect his fireside. It is his disposition to raise his children up in the moral way. It is his desire to keep all contaminating influences from them, and I think the legislature has wisely and properly placed, in these particular actions, the power in the court to do so, and that the court would be recreant to its duty if it did not undertake to discharge the duty cast upon it." Every one who has the welfare of society at heart will doubtless agree with the learned judges of the court below in their opinion as to the policy of a law which would prevent the publication of such matters as they complained of; but the construction placed upon the provisions of the act quoted above is not, we think, authorized by the language of the section. In this country it is a first principle that the people have the right to know what is done in their courts. The old theory of government which invested royalty with an assumed perfection, precluding the possibility of wrong, and denying the right to discuss its conduct of public affairs, is opposed to the genius of our institutions, in which the sovereign will of the people is the paramount idea; and the greatest publicity to the acts of those holding positions of public trust, and the greatest freedom in the discussion of the proceedings of public tribunals that is consistent with truth and decency, are regarded as essential to the public welfare. Therefore, when it is claimed that this right has in any manner been abridged, such claim must find its support, if any there be, in some limitation expressly imposed by the lawmaking power, or the right to exercise the authority claimed must be necessarily implied as essential to the execution of the powers expressly conferred. We find no expression in the section referred to upon which such a claim can be based. If the legislature had intended to prohibit the publication of proceedings in cases tried with closed doors, it would have been easy to declare its will in that regard in express terms. It has not done so, and the right claimed is not essential to the execution of the authority conferred by the section. The assumption that the object of the statute was to protect the public from the contaminating influence of prurient revelations often made in actions of divorce, seduction, and criminal conversation is unwarranted. The object of the act is palpable. It was to secure decorum in the conduct of trials involving the relation of the sexes, and to protect witnesses of refined sensibilities from the ordeal which they might otherwise have to pass through in giving testimony of a delicate or filthy nature in the presence of a crowd of vulgar or curious spectators. To give effect to the section no other intention on the part of the legislature is necessarily implied, and, proceedings for contempt being criminal in their nature, no presumption should be indulged. Section 1032, Pol. Code, adds no strength to the position taken by counsel for respondent. What has been said of section 125, Code Civil Proc., is applicable to section 1032, and may be summed up in the proposition that the public have the right to know and discuss all judicial proceedings, unless such right is expressly interdicted by constitutional or statutory provisions, or unless the publication prohibited by the order of the court is of such a nature as to obstruct or embarrass the court in its administration of the law and the execution of the powers expressly conferred upon it.

2. Counsel for petitioner contend with much emphasis that any act of the legislature or of the court attempting to deprive the people of the right to be informed of judicial proceedings, or to publish or discuss the same, is void. It is said that secrecy and silence in such matters are utterly repugnant to the spirit of our institutions, and opposed to the constitutional declaration of right with respect to free speech and the liberty of the press. Provisions of the Codes are cited showing that the legislature has sought to abridge, rather than to extend, the common-law right of the courts to punish for contempt. Most of them relate purely to questions of libel, but one of them—a recent act of the legislature—provides that “no speech or publication reflecting upon or concerning any court or any officer thereof shall be treated or punished as a contempt of said court, unless made in the immediate presence of such court while in session, and in such manner as to actually interfere with its proceedings.” St. 1891, p. 7. But we know of no decision which supports the proposition contended for. No authority has been found which denies the inherent right of a court, in the absence of a limitation placed upon it by the power which created it, to punish as a contempt an act, whether committed in or out of its presence, which tends to impede, embarrass, or obstruct the court in the discharge of its duties. It is a doctrine which is admitted in all its rigor by American courts everywhere, and does not need the support of foreign authorities, based upon the fiction that the majesty of the king, represented in the persons of the judges, is always present in the court. It is founded upon the principle—which is coeval with the existence of the courts, and as necessary as the right of self-protection—that it is a necessary incident to the execution of the powers conferred upon the court, and is necessary to maintain its dignity, if not its very existence. It exists independently of statute. The legislative department may regulate the procedure and enlarge the power, but it cannot, without trenching upon the constitutional powers of the court, and destroying the autonomy of that system of checks and balances which is one of the chief features of our triple-department form of government, fetter the power itself. In Arkansas the legislature sanctioned the power of the court to punish as contempts certain enumerated acts, and no others. The court held that the sanction was merely declaratory of the common law, and that the prohibitory clause was entitled to respect as an opinion of a co-ordinate branch of the government, but was not binding upon the courts. State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 384. This decision is in line with all the authorities. Although the power is necessarily an arbitrary one to a great extent, it has been exercised by the courts, in this country at least, only as an auxiliary means to attain the ends of justice. If abused by the judges at all, it has been only in the rarest instances. No one has realized more than the judges themselves the fact that a court cannot coerce the respect of the people for itself or its decisions, and the very delicacy of the power has proved to be a safeguard against its abuse. To this alone must be attributed the fact that, although the inherent power referred to has been claimed and exercised by the courts of this country since the organization of the government, the framers of the constitutions in all the states of the Union except Georgia and Louisiana have deemed it unnecessary to place any limitation upon the power of their courts to punish for contempts. Stim. Amer. St. Law, § 582.

Did the article in question tend to embarness, impede, or obstruct the administration of justice? If it did, the petitioner is guilty of contempt, regardless of the order. In determining the question whether the conduct of the petitioner was an unlawful interference with the proceedings of the court, the order itself is a false quantity. As said by his counsel at the argument: "If the law, under the circumstances, prohibited the publication, the order of the court was superfluous; and the petitioner is censurable, regardless of that order, for the all-sufficient reason that he has violated the law. If, on the other hand, the law did not prohibit the publication, the petitioner had the right, under the law, to make it, and that right could not be abridged or taken away by an order." The constitution of every state in the Union guaranties to every citizen the right to freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, and prohibits the passage of any law "to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press." What one may lawfully speak he may lawfully write and publish. The rights thus preserved by the constitution are dear to the heart of every American, and their exercise can be complained of by the courts in a summary proceeding only when the publication or the speech interferes with the proper performance of judicial duty. If there has been no such interference, there has been no contempt. In the article complained of we find nothing which could have interfered with a full and fair investigation of the merits of the case then on trial. The case was before the court without a jury. It is not claimed that the petitioner, in his report, mutilated the testimony, misrepresented or reflected upon the judge, attempted to intimidate or swerve any witness, or to dictate to any one connected with the trial what his action should be in regard to any matter. How, then, could such an article interrupt the orderly conduct of a trial, or tend to induce a failure of justice? With the moral aspect of the case we have nothing to do. The courts are not conservators of public morals. Rules affecting the conduct and morals of the community must proceed from the legislative department. It is argued with some plausibility that the publication of the testimony might deter timid and highly sensitive witnesses from making disclosures which they would make if assured that their utterances would not be given publicity. But this is an argument which would apply to all cases, and rests upon the erroneous assumption that a witness will violate his oath to tell the truth, and the whole truth, to save himself from the mortification incident to the relation and publicity of certain disagreeable facts within his knowledge. There is no real danger of such a result. The testimony which a witness gives in a court of justice is not the discussion of a topic voluntarily selected by him, and for which he may choose his language, and use chaste or unchaste words, regardless of the truth of the facts he is required to detail; and every witness is supposed to appreciate this fact, and to speak the truth without regard to the question who or how many will be informed of the proceedings. We are aware of the fact that there are English precedents for holding that the courts possess and exercise the power to prohibit in all cases the publication of their proceedings; but we know of no decision in this country upholding the right of a court to make such prohibition, except where the publication tended to interfere with the proceedings before the court. Blackstone lays it down as the law of England in his day that it was unlawful and a contempt of court "to print false accounts (or even true ones without proper permission) of causes then dependent in judgment." 4 Bl. Comm. 285. Several English cases are cited which seem to hold this doctrine to the extent stated. But precedents promulgated at a time when the ministers of the crown claimed and exercised the right to seize a newspaper, and stifle the voice of its editor, when books were destroyed and speeches suppressed to subserve political purposes, are of little value in this age, and especially in this country. It was to forever stamp out such a claim and prevent such occurrences that the framers of our constitutions incorporated therein the guaranty of liberty of speech and of the press. This constitutional liberty, as Judge Cooley says, "implies the right to freely utter and publish whatever the citizen may please, and be protected against any responsibility for so doing, except so far as such publications, from their blasphemy, obscenity, or scandalous character, may be a public offense, or as by their falsehood and malice they may injuriously affect the standing, reputation, or pecuniary interests of individuals; * * * implies not only liberty to publish, but complete immunity from legal censure and punishment for the publication, so long as it is not harmful in its character when tested by such standards as the law affords." Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 421. Liberty of the press must not be confounded with mere license. Liberty of the press stops where a further exercise would invade the rights of others. This provision of the constitution does not authorize a usurpation of the functions of the courts. Under the plea of the liberty of the press, a newspaper has no right to assail litigants during the progress of a trial, intimidate witnesses, dictate verdicts or judgments, or spread before juries its opinion of the merits of cases which are on trial. As stated before, what may be spoken may be written; and the converse of the proposition is true, that what may not be spoken under such circumstances may not be written. As the article in question does not go beyond these limitations, and as the section under which the court below proceeded to judgment clearly does not authorize the order which was made, the proceedings must be annulled.

Counsel for respondent claim that the finding of the court that the publication was an unlawful interference with the proceedings of the court, and therefore a contempt, must be taken as conclusive. But where it appears from all the facts found that the publication could not, under any circumstances, constitute a contempt, a judgment thereon imposing a fine or imprisonment is a nullity. It is ordered that the proceedings of the court under review be, and they are hereby, annulled, and the clerk of this court is directed to transmit a copy of the judgment to the clerk of the court below.

CRIMINAL LAW—ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL—OATH OF WITNESS.

1. A trial for robbery lasted five days, three of which were occupied in hearing 24 witnesses. The evidence was circumstantial and conflicting. Held, that an order of the court limiting the time of argument of counsel to one hour exceeded the discretionary power of the court.

2. A refusal of the court to administer to Chinese witnesses an oath other than the usual form, as authorized by Code Civil Proc. §§ 2095, 2096, is not reversible error; such sections not being mandatory, and it not appearing that the witnesses regarded some other form of oath more binding than the usual form.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; S. A. Holmes, Judge.

George Green was convicted of robbery, and appeals. Reversed.

Frank H. Short, G. C. Freeman, and W. H. La Rue, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

PER CURIAM. By information, the defendant and Albert Larsen were jointly accused of the crime of robbery. They demanded separate trials, and the defendant was first separately tried, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of his natural life. He appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The information charges that defendant robbed one You Kam, a Chinaman, of $174 and a gold watch, the property of one San Kee, in the county of Fresno, on the 27th day of April, 1892. Counsel for appellant contend that the court committed several errors prejudicial to the rights of the defendant, the most important of which will be first considered.

which to sum up the evidence, and argue the case to the jury. The trial of the case occupied five days, three of which, at least, were devoted to hearing the testimony of 24 witnesses. When the evidence had been closed, and counsel were ready to proceed with their addresses to the jury, the court said to them: "I think two counsel will be enough to argue the case, and an hour on a side." Mr. Freeman, of counsel for defendant said: "We object to being limited. The Court: Give him the benefit of his exception. Limit you to an hour on a side, gentlemen. Mr. Freeman: Well, we except." Defendant was represented by two counselors, Messrs. Freeman and La Rue, by whose affidavits it appears that the testimony of the 24 witnesses examined at the trial consisted of over 90,000 words, besides the testimony of witnesses taken at the preliminary examination of defendant and others before the magistrate, which was admitted at the trial by stipulation, consisting of over 12,000 words; that only Mr. Freeman addressed the jury on the part of the defendant, and consumed the hour to which defendant's counsel were limited, and closed his address at the expiration thereof; that, by reason of the limitation, counsel for defendant were prevented from presenting several important points to the jury, which they deemed material for the defense, and which they would have considered it their duty to present, and would have presented, but for the limitation of time to which they were subjected by the order of the court; that it was impossible, fully and properly, to argue the case to the jury for the defendant within one hour; and that they believe the rights of the defendant were prejudiced by the limitation. The evidence contained in the bill of exceptions, condensed, as most of it appears to be, into the form of a narrative, occupies 158 pages of the transcript. Much of it is circumstantial, and all contradictory, as to nearly all the material facts. The principal questions as to which the evidence was contradictory and conflicting were: (1) Was the defendant identified as one of the robbers by the three Chinamen who were the only witnesses that testified in chief to such identity? (2) Was the defendant, at the time of the robbery, at a place five miles distant from the place of the robbery? (3) Was it probable that the robbery had been committed by Cliff Ragan, John Fry, and George W. Cain? In the attempted solution of these main questions, numerous subsidiary questions arose, as to which the evidence was conflicting. As to the identity of the defendant, it was claimed that the testimony of the Chinamen was inconsistent with what they had said the day after the robbery, and inconsistent with their testimony at the preliminary examinations of defendant and others whom they had accused of the crime. As to the alleged alibi of the defendant, four witnesses, besides the defendant, testified positively that defendant was at a place five miles distant from the place of the robbery at the time it was committed. This testimony of five white witnesses on the part of the defendant was irreconcilably inconsistent with that of the three Chinamen who had testified in chief on the part of the people. To rebut the evidence of the alibi, the people called from the jail Cliff Ragan, who was imprisoned on a charge of having participated in the same robbery, and also on a charge of another crime distinct from the robbery, who testified that he and the defendant committed the robbery for which defendant was being tried, and that he confessed the crime at the instance of the district attorney, who had told him that it would be easier on him if he told all he knew about it, and that he might get off with two or three years, though he (the district attorney) said he had no control over the amount of punishment, which depended entirely upon the court. He further testified that he was about 20 years of age, and had served one term in the state prison for a felony of which he was convicted in 1888. As to the contention of defendant that the robbery was committed by Cliff Ragan, John Doe Fry, and George Cain, it appeared that, some days after the complaint before the magistrate was made against defendant and Larsen by the Chinamen, the same Chinamen, or some one of them, made like complaints against Ragan, Fry, and Cain, and that warrants for the arrest of these were issued, though Fry and Cain were not arrested. It also appeared that the watch which had been taken from the Chinaman at the time of the robbery was found in the possession of Cain soon after the robbery. This was explained by Cain, in his testimony, by stating that he had received the watch from Ragan, and delivered it to the constable for the purpose of detecting the guilt of Ragan, whose confidence he had solicited and obtained by false pretenses, and then betrayed.

The purpose of the foregoing outlined skeleton is not to indicate an opinion as to the merits of the case, except so far as necessary to establish a basis upon which to estimate the time to which counsel were entitled, in which to sum up and argue the case to the jury on behalf of the defendant, and thereby to test the truth of the affidavits of counsel to the effect that the time to which they were limited was insufficient. That a defendant being tried on a charge of felony has a constitutional right to be fully heard in his defense by counsel, which it is not within the discretionary power of the court to deny or abridge, is not to be questioned. Yet it has been found to be impossible to formulate any abstract rule or definition by which the extent of this right may be ascertained in all cases. It is also well settled that the court has a discretionary power to restrain what has been termed, perhaps not quite appropriately, an "abuse" of this right, by which is meant very little more than that counsel may be restricted to a discussion of matters relevant to the case, and restrained from wasting the time of the court by useless repetition. But it must always be a difficult as well as a delicate matter, in a case like this, for the court to determine in advance what limitation should be imposed upon counsel, against their consent. Williams v. State, 60 Ga. 369. And as was said in the case of People v. Keenan, 13 Cal. 581: "If it [the court] imposes a limitation of time upon counsel, against their consent, this must be done at the risk of a new trial, if it be shown by uncontradicted affidavits that the prisoner was deprived, by the limitation, of the opportunity of a full defense, for this is his constitutional right, without which he cannot be convicted." And in the same case it was said: "It is impossible to deny that, if the constitutional privilege of being heard by counsel be allowed at all, it must be so admitted as that the prisoner may have the benefit of a complete discussion of all the matters of law and evidence embraced by the case." In that case it appeared that the evidence was circumstantial and voluminous, consisting of the testimony of 14 witnesses, (10 less than in this case,) and that the two counsel for defendant were limited to 3 hours, 1 hour and 30 minutes being allowed to each. Yet, for the error of thus limiting counsel, the judgment was reversed. The affidavits of counsel in that case, as to the necessity of more time than was allowed, are substantially the same as in this case. In that case, however, one of defendant's counsel, upon the expiration of the time allowed him, asked for further time, and it is claimed that this difference distinguishes that case from the case at bar. It is not perceived, however, that a repetition or counsel's objection and exception would strengthen their point. The court, without consulting them, limited them to one hour. They duly objected to being limited. The court peremptorily repeated the order. They excepted, and submitted to the order, and obeyed it without begging for a modification of it. In the case of Dille v. State, 34 Ohio St. 617, wherein a like exception had been taken to an order of the trial court limiting counsel to 30 minutes, the appellate court said: "Counsel sufficiently indicated that in their judgment the thirty minutes allowed for argument was insufficient, by promptly protesting against it, and the defendant saved his right by excepting to the limitation at the time it was imposed." In this Ohio case the defendant had been convicted of burglary and larceny on the testimony of seven witnesses for the state, four witnesses testifying on the part of the defendant, and only half a day was occupied in taking all the testimony. There were no affidavits of counsel. The bill of exceptions contained merely a statement of the evidence, the order of the court limiting counsel to 30 minutes, and the objection and exception by defendant. From the nature of the evidence alone, it was determined that the order limiting counsel was in excess of the discretionary power of the trial court. Among other things, the court said: "The court has no discretionary power over the right itself, for it cannot be denied; and hence it has no right to prevent the accused from being heard by counsel, even if the evidence against him be clear, unimpeached, and conclusive, in the opinion of the court. But the exercise of the right is subject to judicial control, to the extent that is necessary to prevent the abuse of it. * * * There were seven witnesses for the state, and four for the defendant. Half a day was occupied in the taking of the testimony. It was entirely circumstantial, and there was serious conflict in it. Under these circumstances, when the defendant's liberty was at stake, and an ignominious punishment threatening him, he was entitled to be heard, in a reasonable manner, by both counsel whom he had employed for his defense." Several cases in which orders limiting counsel have been affirmed are cited by counsel for the people, but they are all in harmony with the foregoing, as to the right of the accused, and the limitations upon the discretionary power of the court. None of them is a precedent for this case, except, perhaps, State v. Collins, 70 N. C. 241, which, it is said, has been reversed by an act of the legislature of that state, providing that "any attorney appearing in any civil or criminal action shall be entitled to address the court or jury for such a space of time as, in his opinion, may be necessary for the proper development and presentation of his case." Under the circumstances of this case, we think the order limiting counsel for defendant to one hour exceeded the discretionary power of the court. Aside from the affidavits of counsel, it appears from the bill of exceptions that the evidence was voluminous, partly circumstantial, and extremely conflicting; so that its effect upon the three leading issues, to say nothing of incidental questions, was fairly debatable. As was justly said by Mr. Justice Baldwin in People v. Keenan, supra: "It is very difficult for a judge to determine what effect a given line of argument may have upon a jury, or some one of them, or what period may be necessary to enable counsel to present, in the aspect deemed by them important, the case of their client. The minds of men are so differently constituted that an advocate may require much more for the statement and elaboration of his view than another."

As only one of the other points made by appellant will probably arise on a new trial, that one only need be considered. It is that the court erred in refusing to administer to the Chinese witnesses a form of oath other than the usual form, as authorized by sections 2095 and 2096 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In answer to this, it is enough to say that it does not appear that the court was informed that those witnesses had "a peculiar mode of swearing * * * more solemn or obligatory" than the usual form, nor that they believed "in any other than the Christian religion." And it may be added that those sections of the Code are not mandatory, but merely permissive, at the discretion of the court, under the circumstances therein stated. To show an abuse of the discretionary power conferred, it should be made to appear, at least, that the witness regarded some other form of oath more obligatory than the form usually adopted in this state, and perhaps that he did not consider the latter at all obligatory. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

McFARLAND, J., (concurring.) I feel compelled, under the authorities, to concur with my associates in reversing the judgment; but I do so with great reluctance, and some doubt. The manner of nisi prius courts in conducting trials, nowadays, is not generally subject to the criticism of too great curtailment of the privileges of attorneys. On the other hand, it seems to me that attorneys are frequently given too much latitude to conduct trials according to their own pleasure. The presiding judge should always hold the reins, and should apply the curb when occasion requires it. Neither should the time given for argument always be gauged by the length of the trial, for tedious and useless prolongations of examinations and cross-examinations of witnesses, and needlessly long discussions of objections to evidence, frequently cause a trial to drag through a couple of weeks, when it should have been concluded in two or three days. In the case at bar, however, it seems that there was a good deal of material and proper evidence, which was conflicting as to several matters important to the case, and necessary for the jury to be sure about; and, under these circumstances, one hour was hardly sufficient time for appellant's counsel to properly present his views. I hope, however, that this decision will not give trial courts the notion that they can prescribe no reasonable limits, in point of time, to the arguments of counsel.

PEOPLE v. DANIELS. (No. 20,980.)

ARSON—INSTRUCTIONS—MALICE—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

1. On a trial for arson an instruction that "malice, within the meaning of the law, includes not only anger, hatred, and revenge, but every other unlawful and unjustifiable motive," is correct; Pen. Code, § 7, subd. 4, providing that "the words 'malice' and 'maliciously' import a wish to vex, annoy or injure another person, or an intent to do a wrongful act."

2. An instruction that, "where the evidence is entirely circumstantial, yet is not only consistent with the guilt of the defendant, but inconsistent with any other rational conclusion, the law makes it the duty of the jury to convict, notwithstanding such evidence may not be as satisfactory to their minds as the direct testimony of credible eyewitnesses would have been," is correct. People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 202, followed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

R. Daniels was convicted of arson in the second degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Stephens, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

BELCHER, C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of arson in the second degree, and has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The only grounds urged for a reversal are that the court erred in giving to the jury portions of two instructions asked by the people, and in its rulings upon the admissibility of certain evidence. It was proved that the defendant was present at the time and place of the fire, but otherwise the evidence against him was entirely circumstantial. The court instructed the jury, in the language of the Penal Code, that arson is the willful and malicious burning of a building with intent to destroy it, and that the offense is divided into two degrees, etc. It next gave an instruction to the effect that, to constitute the offense charged, the intent alleged in the information must be proved, but direct and positive testimony is not necessary to prove it. It may be inferred from the evidence if there are any facts proved which satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt of its existence. Then follows the clause first objected to, in these words: "The court instructs the jury that malice, within the meaning of the law, includes not only anger, hatred, and revenge, but every other unlawful and unjustifiable motive." The only criticism of the instruction is that "the definition of malice is fatally incorrect," but in what respect it is incorrect is not stated, nor are any authorities cited. The Penal Code defines "malice" and "maliciously" as follows: "The words 'malice' and 'maliciously' import a wish to vex, annoy, or injure another person, or an intent to do a wrongful act, established either by proof or presumption of law." Section 7, subd. 4. In the connection in which they are used, the phrases "an intent to do a wrongful act" and "every other unlawful and unjustifiable motive" must be held, in our opinion, to mean substantially the same thing. There was therefore no prejudicial error in the words complained of.

The court also instructed the jury in regard to direct and circumstantial evidence in the language used and approved in People v. Morrow, 60 Cal. 142. Then followed the part of the instruction secondly objected to, in these words: "Where the evidence is entirely circumstantial, yet is not only consistent with the guilt of the defendant, but inconsistent with any other rational conclusion, the law makes it the duty of the jury to convict, notwithstanding such evidence may not be as satisfactory to their minds as the direct testimony of credible eyewitnesses would have been." It is claimed that the court erred in giving this instruction, but here, again, no particular error is pointed out and no authorities are cited. The language quoted is copied from the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Sanderson in People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 202, and, so far as we are advised, it has never been overruled or questioned. It must be held, therefore, that the instruction stated the law correctly.

The points in regard to the admissibility of evidence are made by simply calling attention to certain folios in the transcript, where the rulings and exceptions are to be found. This way of presenting a case in this court is not very satisfactory, but we have examined the folios referred to, and fail to see any material error in any of the rulings. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

4 Cal. Unrep. 250

BRADLEY et al. v. PARKER. (No. 18,141.) (Supreme Court of California. Sept. 28, 1893.)

HARMLESS ERROR—AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS.

1. Where a finding on one of the issues involved is determinative of the case against plaintiffs, the failure of the court to find on defendant's plea of the statute of limitations as to one of the plaintiffs is not prejudicial to such plaintiff.

2. Where the complaint in an action for conversion describes plaintiffs as heirs of one B., which is merely matter of inducement, an amendment will not be allowed, after trial, so as to count on plaintiffs' rights, as heirs of B., whose estate had not been administered on or distributed, to sue for conversion of property of which they had never been in possession, and which defendant had received under a contract to which plaintiffs were not parties, as such amendment would raise new issues, which would probably require a new trial.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; William W. Cross, Judge.

Action by James S. Bradley, Helen Trav-ers, and Edwin Bradley against B. G. Parker to enforce a trust. There was a judgment in favor of defendant, and plaintiff James S. Bradley appeals. Affirmed.

E. O. Larkins and Chas. G. Lamberson, for appellant. Bradley & Farnsworth, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought to enforce a trust against the defendant on account of certain sheep received by him to be kept for the plaintiffs. Defendant had judgment, from which, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, James S. Bradley, one of the plaintiffs, appeals.

According to the amended complaint, one James H. Bradley died intestate, in the county of Tulare, August 4, 1870, leaving an estate consisting of real and personal property, among the latter of which was 1,500 head of sheep. His heirs were Margaret Bradley, his widow, and the plaintiffs herein, who are their children, all of whom were minors at the date of their father's death. At the time of the commencement of this suit, appellant was of the age of 21 years, and the other plaintiffs were aged 23 years and 26 years, respectively. No administration was ever had on the estate of James H. Bradley. About 1877, Margaret Bradley, the widow and mother of plaintiffs, entered into an agreement with defendant, whereby the latter was to take charge of said sheep for said plaintiffs, in trust for them, to render an account of the issues and profits, and to account for all the increase. Defendant took the sheep to Utah about 1878, and, contrary to his trust, traded some of the sheep for cattle, sold some to pay his own debts, sold the remainder, as well as the cattle, and retained the money, and mingled it with his own, and since 1878 has enjoyed the profit thereon, without right, etc. The complaint further avers that, before the trust agreement was entered into, Margaret Bradley had taken possession of certain of the property of the estate, and had given her interest in the sheep to plaintiffs, whereby it is alleged they became the legal owners thereof. Defendant is averred to have received for the sheep $2,000, which, with the accumulations since 1878, now amounts to $4,000, which sum plaintiffs pray be declared a trust fund, and defendant be decreed to pay with interest, and that he account, etc. It is also alleged that the defendant has never disavowed the trust. The complaint is not verified. The answer denies all the material allegations of the complaint, and pleads the statute of limitations. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and written findings filed, upon which the judgment was entered. The findings of the court negative all the allegations of the amended complaint charging the existence of a trust relation between defendant and the plaintiffs. The court then proceeds to find that October 1, 1876, Margaret Bradley, the mother of plaintiffs, had in her possession about 650 sheep, in poor condition, which she let to defendant for one year; the latter to care for them for one year, and each to have one-half the wool and increase. The winter of 1876-77 was very dry, and in the spring of 1877 feed failed, and defendant, having 7,000 sheep of his own, was compelled to move them, in quest of food. Defendant requested Margaret Bradley to take charge of her sheep, which she did not desire to do; and thereupon a new agreement was made, by which defendant was to take the Bradley sheep with his own, pay himself for the expenses and trouble of their care, and, if anything was left, to pay it to Mrs. Bradley. Defendant started with the sheep for Utah, having in all 7,800, of which all died on the road, except 3,100. The Bradley sheep being very poor, a greater proportion of them died than those of defendant. Defendant sold $200 worth of sheep to pay expenses, among which were some 10 to 20 of the Bradley sheep worth $2 per head. Defendant traded off all the remainder of the sheep—among them, about 125 head left of the Bradley sheep, worth $2 per head—for 180 head of cattle, which he afterward sold for $20 per head, but did not receive the money therefor, the same having been garnished under a writ of attachment against defendant, in favor of the Bank of Visalia, for moneys advanced to defendant, and by him expended in taking the sheep to Utah. The 650 head of sheep belonged to the estate of James H. Bradley, deceased, although defendant was not aware of that fact; he supposing the estate had been closed, and that the sheep belonged exclusively to Margaret Bradley, the widow. The court found against the averment that the sheep had been given to the plaintiffs. The court also found, upon the plea of the statute of limitations, in favor of defendant, and against all the plaintiffs except James S. Bradley. The agreements were both oral. The findings are lengthy and explicit. The foregoing is but a synopsis of them.

It is objected that the court failed to find upon the plea of the statute of limitations as to the plaintiff James S. Bradley. This was of no consequence. The issues upon which the court passed were determinative of plaintiffs' right to recover; and, as a judgment against James S. Bradley necessarily followed those findings, it could not in the least have benefited him, had a finding been entered in his favor on that issue. Windhaus v. Bootz, 92 Cal. 617, 28 Pac. Rep. 557; Johnson v. Vance, 86 Cal. 130, 24 Pac. Rep. 863; Dyer v. Brogan, 70 Cal. 133, 11 Pac. Rep. 589; McCourtney v. Fortune 57 Cal. 617; Porter v. Woodward, Id., 535; Murphy v. Bennett, 68 Cal. 530, 9 Pac. Rep. 738.

Appellant also contends that, although the plaintiffs failed to establish the trust upon which they counted in their complaint, still, as they were entitled to any relief embraced within the issues, plaintiff James S. Bradley was entitled to recover such pro rata of the proceeds from the sale of the sheep belonging to the estate of James H. Bradley, deceased, as the evidence showed him entitled to. Appellant does not attempt to show us what particular sum of money or pro rata share thereof James S. Bradley was entitled to recover. In the light of the new agreement entered into between Mrs. Bradley and defendant before the latter left with the sheep for Utah, and of the fact that all the proceeds arising from the sale of the entire lot of sheep went to pay the expenses incurred, it is not perceived that anything was left to go to the plaintiff designated.

After the trial and before judgment was entered, the plaintiffs asked leave to file a second amended complaint, making Margaret E. Bradley, the mother of plaintiffs, a co-plaintiff, and setting out an entirely new cause of action. The court refused leave to so amend, and the action is assigned as error. The question of amendments to pleadings is one in which much must be left to the discretion of the nisi prius court, and it is only where there is an abuse of such discretion that this court will reverse its action. In furtherance of justice the courts of this state have gone further, probably, in permitting amendments, than in those of any other jurisdiction within the Union. In New York, it is said, the real limitation seems to be that the amendment shall not bring a new cause of action. Reeder v. Sayre, 70 N. Y. 190. In Walsh v. McKeen, 75 Cal. 519, 17 Pac. Rep. 673, the court below, during the trial, permitted plaintiff to amend the prayer of a complaint which originally demanded a money judgment so as to include a demand for an accounting and for general relief, thus virtually changing the cause of action from one at law to recover money to an equitable action, and this court sustained its action. It is highly probable that in that and other cases of like import, had the court below refused leave to amend, this court would not have deemed it proper to say the courts have abused the discretion confided to them. Be that as it may, the present case does not fall within any rule calling for a reversal for the reasons indicated. Here the proffered second amended complaint came after the trial had closed, and, while it purported to be an amendment "to correspond to the facts as proven by the testimony in the case," it in fact raised new issues, calling for an answer from the defendant, and which would, in all probability, have required a new trial of the cause. The complaint upon which the action was tried rested upon the trust relation created by contract with defendant for the benefit of plaintiffs,—a relation in which defendant was a trustee, and plaintiffs the beneficiaries. It is true, they were described as the heirs of James H. Bradley, deceased. This was merely matter of inducement, and not material. The proffered amended complaint counted upon their rights, as heirs of said James H. Bradley, to the property, and their rights, as such heirs, to maintain an action for the conversion of personal property received under a contract to which they were not parties, which had never been in their possession, and which belonged to an estate upon which no administration had been had, and in which no distribution is averred. These questions have not, so far as we are aware, been decided in this state; questions upon which, in the absence of statutory provisions, much discussion has occurred elsewhere, resulting in a diversity of opinion; questions which should not be determined lightly, and without a full opportunity for a hearing pro and con. Under such circumstances, there was no abuse of discretion on the part of the learned court in refusing leave to amend.

The attack upon the third finding of the court is without merit. That finding is to the effect that "all the allegations of paragraph 3 of said plaintiffs' amended complaint are untrue." It then goes on to find that defendant did not agree to take the sheep in trust for plaintiffs, that he never held them in trust, that he never detained or disposed of them in violation of any trust, etc., and then adds, "on the contrary, the facts are as follows," whereupon the whole history of the contract with Margaret Bradley, in relation to the sheep, and what was done with them and the proceeds, are fully set out. The contention of the appellant is that many of the allegations of the third paragraph of the complaint are concededly true; hence, that portion of the finding which we have quoted is erroneous. From a legal standpoint, and in the view which the court took of the testimony, the allegations are not true. The gravamen of the charges is that, pursuant to an agreement, defendant received certain sheep as a trustee of plaintiffs; that, contrary to said trust, he disposed of the sheep and received the money therefor, etc. In this view, the allegations were untrue, and the finding illustrates the transaction clearly by first stating the untruth, and then setting out succinctly the whole transaction. Instead of being subject to criticism, the finding, taken as a whole, affords an example which it would be well for courts to follow more frequently.

The other objections to the findings are not more cogent than those mentioned, and need not be further considered. The evidence was contradictory upon all the material issues. Upon a review of the whole case, we are of opinion the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION—SIGNATURE—EVIDENCE—POSSESSION OF STOLEN PROPERTY—PROOF OF VENUE.

1. It is sufficient that the name of the district attorney is signed to an indictment or information by his deputy.

2. On a prosecution for robbery, an instruction that defendants' possession of the stolen property shortly after the crime, and their failure to account for such possession, are circumstances to show their guilt, and that they were bound to explain the possession to remove its effect, is not error where the court has also charged that such possession is not of itself sufficient to warrant a conviction, but merely a circumstance to show guilt.

3. Where an indictment charges the offense to have been committed in the county of Los Angeles, evidence showing the crime to have been committed in the city of Los Angeles is sufficient proof of venue, since the court will take judicial notice that the city of Los Angeles is the county seat of Los Angeles county.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Louis Etting and Burt Hadley were convicted of robbery, and appeal. Affirmed.

R. Dunnigan and C. W. C. Rowell, for appellants. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

SEARLS, C. Defendants were charged by information with robbery, committed in the county of Los Angeles September 6, 1892, and upon a trial were convicted. The appeal is from the judgment of conviction, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The information was signed as follows: "James McLachlan, District Attorney in and for the County of Los Angeles, State of California. By B. W. Diel, Deputy." It is sufficient that the name of the district attorney is signed to an indictment or information by his deputy. People v. Darr, 61 Cal. 554; People v. Turner, 85 Cal. 432, 24 Pac. Rep. 857.

The following instruction was given to the jury at the request of the prosecution, and the action is assigned as error: "If the jury believe the property was stolen, and was seen in the possession of defendants shortly after being stolen, the failure of the defendants to account for such possession, or to show that such possession was honestly obtained, is a circumstance tending to show their guilt; and the accused is bound to explain the possession in order to remove the effect of the possession as a circumstance to be considered in connection with other suspicious facts, if the evidence discloses any such." In the instruction immediately preceding the foregoing the court had instructed the jury that "the mere possession of stolen property, unexplained by defendant, however soon after the taking, is not sufficient to justify a conviction; it is merely a guilty circumstance, which, taken in connection with other testimony, is to determine the question of guilt," etc. Again, at the request of defendant, the court instructed as follows: "The mere possession of property recently stolen is not of itself sufficient evidence upon which to convict the prisoner of the theft. It is a circumstance tending to show guilt, but not of itself sufficient to warrant conviction." This court, in People v. Fagan, 66 Cal. 534, 6 Pac. Rep. 394, upheld an instruction of similar import with the one here objected to. The instructions are to be taken together, and read as a whole, and when so read, if they correctly interpret the law applicable to the case, no error is committed. With the explanations contained in the other instructions, and in view of the former rulings of this court, the contention of appellants cannot be maintained. People v. Chambers, 18 Cal. 383; People v. Kelly, 28 Cal. 424; People v. Rundoo, 44 Cal. 538; People v. Clough, 59 Cal. 438; People v. Velarde, Id. 457.

The venue was sufficiently proved. The information charged the offense to have been committed at the county of Los Angeles, state of California. The trial was had at Los Angeles county. The prosecuting witness described the robbery and loss of his watch as having occurred in Los Angeles. The defendants, as witnesses, described certain circumstances connected with their supposed guilt, and their residence and presence in Los Angeles on the night of the robbery. There was no suggestion that the supposed offense was committed elsewhere than at Los Angeles, in the county of Los Angeles. People v. Tonielli, 81 Cal. 275, 22 Pac. Rep. 678; People v. Manning, 48 Cal. 338. The courts will take judicial notice of "whatever is established by law," (Code Civil Proc. § 1875, subd. 2,) and hence that Los Angeles is the county seat of Los Angeles county, and in said county. The evidence was conflicting, and sufficient to uphold the verdict. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. KOENING. (No. 20,967.)

ACCOMPLICE TESTIMONY—CORROBORATION.

Testimony of a woman that she gave to defendant, who was charged with being her accomplice, money which she admitted having stolen from one G., and that defendant had advised her to "work" some money out of G., is not corroborated by evidence that, when the woman was arrested for the larceny, defendant asked to see her, told the sheriff that he had arrested the wrong woman, and told the undersheriff that he did not know her, though there is also evidence, which defendant contradicted, that the woman had been his mistress.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; John C. Gray, Judge.

Fred Koenig was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Reversed.

R. Clark and J. M. McGee, for appellant. Lewis Freer, for the People.

SEARLS, C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny, committed at Oroville, county of Butte, July 8, 1892. He moved for a new trial, which was denied, and thereupon he appeals. He was convicted as an accomplice of one Sarah Brady, who admits that she committed the offense, and the only question calling for discussion relates to the sufficiency of the evidence in corroboration of said Brady. The testimony tended to show that on the 3d of July, 1892, defendant engaged to one Klein to tend bar for the latter in place of his regular bartender, who was ill. Defendant and Sarah Brady were acquainted, and had lived together, more or less, for a year or two. Chris Gilmer was accustomed to visit the saloon of Klein, and at times slept there. On the afternoon of July 7th, Sarah Brady visited the saloon, met Gilmer there, and they drank together repeatedly. The Brady woman returned to the saloon the same evening, again met Gilmer, who had retired to an adjoining room, usually occupied by the regular barkeeper. Gilmer was aroused, and they again had numerous potations, after which they retired, occupying together a bed in the bartender's room. In the early morning, Sarah Brady extracted from beneath the pillow $80.50, the property of Gilmer, and, according to her testimony, found defendant lying on a lounge in the saloon, to whom she gave the money. She testifies further that defendant had on the previous evening advised her to work some money out of Gilmer, and had said, "If you don't get that money, you are no good," etc. The only evidence against defendant, in corroboration of the above testimony of Sarah Brady, is to the effect that when she was arrested he went to the sheriff, and desired to see her, and, upon his request being refused, said, in the language of the sheriff: "He told me that I had the wrong woman. Then he went off,"—and in the language of the undersheriff: "Defendant said he did not know, or have anything to do with, her." On the part of defendant there was testimony tending to show that he did not sleep in the saloon on the evening in question, but that he left before the proprietor, who locked up the place, and that defendant had no key thereto, so far as he (the proprietor) knew. There was also evidence as to defendant's previous good character for honesty, by many apparently reliable witnesses. Defendant was a witness in his own behalf, and declared he left the saloon before the proprietor; that he had no key; and that, when he returned in the morning, the saloon had been opened by Ed., the old barkeeper. He denied that the Brady woman was his mistress, admitted he had been at her house sometimes, and accounted for his inquiry at the jail by saying he was acquainted with her, had heard she was arrested, and desired to know what she was arrested for.

This testimony was not sufficient to warrant a conviction. Sarah Brady was, confessedly, the perpetrator of the felony. The testimony as to defendant's complicity all came from her. "A conviction cannot be had on the testimony of an accomplice, unless he is corroborated by other evidence, which, in itself, and without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense, or the circumstances thereof." Pen. Code, § 1111. No inference of the guilt of the defendant can be drawn from the fact that he was at the saloon on the evening of the commission of the crime, beyond the fact that it gave him an opportunity to advise its commission. His business called him there, and his presence was not a suspicious circumstance. His inquiry at the sheriff's office is not regarded of sufficient importance to warrant a conviction. At most, it could only raise a bare suspicion, and falls short of such corroboration as can be safely relied upon to support a conviction. People v. Ames, 39 Cal. 403; People v. Thompson, 50 Cal. 430. It is the peculiar province of the jury to weigh the evidence and determine the credibility of witnesses, and this court will not, in case of a substantial conflict in the evidence, disturb the verdict of the jury. So, in case of the corroboration of an accomplice, if there is any substantial evidence in support of a satisfactory case made by the accomplice, the court will not trench upon the province of the jury by reversing its action. In the present instance, however, the figment of evidence in support of the testimony of the accomplice does not rise to the dignity of corroboration, and the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

WOODWARD v. FRUITVALE SANITARY DIST. et al. No. 15,439.)

SANITARY DISTRICTS—FORMATION—OFFICERS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

1. The presentation of a petition to the board of county supervisors praying for the formation of a sanitary district is a sufficient manifestation of the desire of the petitioners for the formation of such a district, as required by St. 1891, p. 223, and the petition need not contain an express statement of such a desire.

2. A petition for the formation of such a district signed by 25 residents and freeholders of the proposed district, as required by St. 1891, p. 223, is not vitiated by the addition of signatures of other persons not possessing the requisite qualifications.

3. The posting on October 4th of notices for holding an election on November 8th to determine the question as to the formation of a sanitary district, which notices remain posted for four successive weeks, is a sufficient compliance with St. 1891, p. 223, § 3, which requires notices "to be posted for four successive weeks prior to the election," and not that the posting shall be during the four weeks next preceding the election.

4. The fact that the persons duly elected as the officers of a sanitary district met, qualified, and organized before the votes were canvassed by the board of supervisors, and before they were officially declared elected, is no ground for questioning in a collateral proceeding their official acts done after such canvass.

5. Act March 31, 1891, (St. 1891, p. 223,) authorizing the organization and creation of sanitary districts throughout the state, and empowering such districts to issue bonds for the construction of sewers and drains, is within the police power of the legislature; and the courts will not assume that the act must include cities and towns, and is therefore in violation of Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 11-13, which prohibit the legislature from interfering with the municipal functions of the different cities and towns within the state.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Submission of an agreed statement of facts to determine a controversy between F. J. Woodward and the Fruitvale sanitary district and others. From a judgment in favor of the sanitary district Woodward appeals. Affirmed.

Freeman & Bates, for appellant. Reed & Nusbaumer and Chas. E. Snook, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is a controversy submitted to the court below upon an agreed statement of facts, as provided for by section 1138 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Judgment was rendered in favor of the sanitary district, and Woodward appeals. The proceeding was initiated by F. J. Woodward, a taxpayer within the Fruitvale sanitary district, to test the validity of the organization of such district, and the legality of certain bonds issued by the sanitary board, as well as the validity of a tax levied by said sanitary board upon property in said district. The Fruitvale sanitary district was organized under and pursuant to an act of the legislature of the state of California, approved March 31, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for the formation, government, operation and dissolution of sanitary districts in any part of the state for the construction of sewers and other sanitary purposes," etc. St. 1891, p. 223.

The first point made by appellant is that the petition for the formation of the district is defective in this: (1) That the petition "does not state distinctly the desire of the petitioners to form a district, nor what the name of the district is to be;" (2) that, while the petition was signed by 36 persons, only 25 of them were freeholders within the district. The petition is addressed to the "Hon. Board of Supervisors of the County of Alameda, State of California," and provides as follows: "We, the undersigned, residents and freeholders of the hereinafter described district, to be known as 'Fruitvale Sanitary District,' bounded and described as follows, to wit, [then follows a description of the bounds of the proposed district,] do respectfully petition your Hon. Board that, in conformity with an act to provide for the formation, government, operation, and dissolution of sanitary districts in any part of the state, * * * you do call an election within said district for the purpose stated in said act." The first section of the act referred to in the petition reads as follows: "Whenever twenty-five persons in any county of the state shall desire the formation of a sanitary district within the county, they may present to the board of supervisors of such county a petition signed by them, stating the name of the proposed district, and setting forth the boundaries thereof, and praying that an election be held as provided in said act. Each of the petitioners must be a resident and freeholder within the proposed district." St. 1891, p. 223.

The desire to form a sanitary district is made manifest by filing a petition as provided by the statute. Beyond this expression of the desire of the petitioners it was unnecessary to go. The statute having prescribed the manner by which the desire for a sanitary district is to be shown, no other or further evidence of such desire is required, and, had the petitioners expressed affirmatively their desire in the premises, it would have added nothing as evidence to the force of their petition. They stated "the name of the proposed district" in their petition. It was according to that instrument to be known as the "Fruitvale Sanitary District." This was clearly a sufficient designation of a name for the proposed district.

The petition is signed by 36 names, and, according to the agreed statement of facts, "each and all of the thirty-six persons who signed said petition were then residents of, but only twenty-five of them were freeholders within the boundaries of, the proposed sanitary district." The law is complied with in that respect when 25 petitioners, as in this case, sign the petition, each of whom is a resident and freeholder within the proposed district. The object of the statute is to have that number of petitioners thus qualified, and the addition of others wanting in these essential qualifications does not vitiate the petition.

Within 30 days after filing the petition, and on, to wit, October 3, 1892, the board of supervisors of Alameda county, in regular session, acted upon the petition, and by resolution provided for an election in said sanitary district to be held on the 8th day of November, 1892, for the purpose of determining the question of the formation of a sanitary district within said county of Alameda, to be known and designated as the "Fruitvale Sanitary District," and for the election of officers of said district, etc., setting out the boundaries of the district, defining the officers to be elected, etc., as provided by section 2 of the act hereinbefore referred to, and provided for posting and publishing a copy of the order for four weeks, as in said act provided. It is objected that this order was not posted for four successive weeks prior to the election, as by section 3 of the act provided. The evidence on this subject is "that on the 4th day of October, 1892, a copy of the order last above mentioned was posted for four successive weeks prior to the 8th day of November, 1892, (the date fixed for the election,) in three public places within the limits of the proposed sanitary district, and a copy of said order was published," etc. The language of the statute is: "A copy of such order shall be posted for four successive weeks prior to the election," etc. This language is frequently used in statutes directing the publication of notices, while in the matter of posting the usual direction is that it be posted at least, etc., specifying some given time before a fixed date or event. The evidence of posting is perhaps somewhat obscure, but the inference is fairly deducible that the notice was posted on the 4th of October, 1892, and remained posted for four successive weeks prior to November 8, 1892. The statute does not in terms provide that the four successive weeks of posting shall be the four successive weeks next preceding the election, and the evidence of posting, being a literal compliance with the letter of the statute, is regarded as sufficient.

The election was held on the 8th day of November, 1892, at which a majority of the voters voted in favor of the formation of a sanitary district, and by a like vote a sanitary assessor and five members of the sanitary board were elected, pursuant to the call of the board of supervisors, and as provided in the statute. On the 18th day of November following, the board of supervisors canvassed the votes of said election, and as a result, after reciting a compliance with the statute, ordered that the sanitary district be established, defining its boundaries, and declared P. H. Blake duly elected as sanitary assessor, and P. L. Barrett, C. D. Bennett, A. C. Fay, J. H. W. Riley, and A. Schroyer duly elected as the sanitary board of said Fruitvale sanitary district, they severally having received a majority of the votes cast for said several offices. On the 14th day of November, 1892, the said officers so afterwards declared elected met and organized by the election of said J. H. W. Riley as president and said C. D. Bennett as secretary. It is objected by appellant that this organization was premature and unauthorized, and, as there is no evidence that a president and secretary have since been elected, there are no duly authorized officers of the board. The statute provides that, "if a majority of the votes cast at such election shall be in favor of a sanitary district, the board of supervisors shall make and cause to be entered in the minutes an order that a sanitary district of the name and with the boundaries stated in the petition (setting forth such boundaries) has been duly established, and said order shall be conclusive evidence of the fact and regularity of all prior proceedings of every kind and nature provided for by this act or by law, and of the existence and validity of the district." Section 4. The act in question does not provide in terms that the vote for officers of the district shall be canvassed by the board of supervisors. It does, however, provide that "such election shall be conducted in accordance with the general election laws of the state, so far as the same shall be applicable, except as herein otherwise provided." "Where a person is elected to an office, his right is established by the result of the election, and does not depend upon his getting a commission, for in such a case the choice comes from the people, and, when they have voted, the last act required of them has been performed. In such a case the issuing of a commission is merely a ministerial act, to be performed by the proper officer, and not, as in the case of taking by appointment, a part of the act to be done." Conger v. Gilmer, 32 Cal. 80. The members of the sanitary board are not required to file a bond, and they are required by the statute to elect a president and secretary at their first meeting. If it be conceded that they prematurely met and organized, it did not affect their eligibility or right to act as a board when thereafter commissioned. The contention is not that they have not been duly elected and qualified, but that they organized before the votes were canvassed by the supervisors, and the result declared. Under such circumstances, the acts of the officers as such since they received their commissions, being under color of office, would be valid. Having been regularly elected and qualified as members of the sanitary board, their acts as officers of such board in signing bonds cannot be inquired into in this collateral proceeding, but only by some direct proceeding to test their right to the offices which they are in fact filling.

Is the act of March 31, 1891, permitting the organization and creation of sanitary districts, constitutional? The contention of appellant seems based upon the theory that the act attempts to authorize the invasion by the legislature and by the special boards provided for in the act of the functions of municipal corporations; that the powers conferred relate to sewers and drains; and that the only bonds provided to be issued under the act must be "for the construction of sewers;" and while it is admitted that districts may be formed within a territory not embracing a municipal corporation, such as a city or town, still, as it applies to any part of the state, it must in many instances embrace such cities and towns, and the powers conferred come in conflict with those delegated to the municipal authorities thereof. Section 6 of article 11 of the constitution inhibits the legislature from creating municipal corporations by special laws, but provides that it shall provide by general laws for the incorporation, organization, and classification in proportion to population of cities and towns. Section 12 of the same article provides that "the legislature shall have no power to impose taxes upon counties, cities, towns, or other public or municipal corporations, or upon the inhabitants or property thereof, for county, city, town or other municipal purposes, but may by general laws vest in the corporate authorities thereof the power to assess and collect taxes for such purposes." Section 13 of the article provides that "the legislature shall not delegate to any special commission, private corporation, company, association, or individual, any power to make, control, appropriate, supervise, or in any way interfere with, any county, city, town or municipal improvement, money, property, or effects, whether held in trust or otherwise, or to levy taxes or assessments, or perform any municipal functions whatever." Section 11 of article 11 provides that "any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." These provisions may be epitomized as follows: (1) The legislature may not create corporations for municipal purposes by special laws, but may provide therefor by general laws. (2) The legislature shall not impose taxes upon such corporations or the inhabitants or property thereof for municipal purposes, but may by general law authorize such corporations to do so. (3) The legislature cannot delegate to other than the municipal corporations power to assess, collect taxes, or to control, appropriate, or supervise, or interfere with municipal improvement, money, or effects. (4) Any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits such local, police, and sanitary laws, etc., and other regulations, as do not conflict with general laws.

The argument is that the statute in question applies to the whole state, and hence will in many instances involve the formation of sanitary districts embracing cities and towns; that among the recognized municipal functions of cities and towns, the power to construct sewers and drains, and to manage and control them for the purpose of improving sanitary conditions, occupies a prominent place; that the subject-matter of the act is sewers and drains, and is, in effect, an attempt on the part of the legislature to interfere with municipal functions, and hence in violation of section 6 of article 11 of the constitution; that the power conferred by the act necessarily involves the right to assess property for municipal purposes, and hence falls within the prohibition of section 12 of article 11; and, further, that the act under consideration attempts to delegate to a special commission power to levy taxes, and to make, control, and supervise municipal improvements, and exercise municipal functions within cities and towns, in violation of section 13 of said article 11. People v. Lynch, 51 Cal. 33, and Yarnell v. City of Los Angeles, 87 Cal. 603, 25 Pac. Rep. 767, are cited in support of this contention. Those cases relate to the power of the legislature to interfere by direct legislation in the municipal affairs of Sacramento and Los Angeles, respectively. The vice of the argument on the part of appellant lies in the fact that it presupposes that the act under consideration must include cities and towns, and must interfere with their municipal functions. There is no suggestion that the Fruitvale sanitary district embraces within its boundaries any city or town, or that the powers to construct sewers, etc., to assess and levy taxes, in any way interferes with or affects any such municipality. To the legislature is confided the entire power of the people to make laws not granted by the federal constitution to congress or inhibited by that of the state constitution. In passing upon the constitutionality of the statute, we are not required to imagine some possible contingency in which its provisions may conflict with the constitution or with other statutes, but to determine whether, in its general scope and in the manner provided for its enforcement, it is within the province of the lawmaking power. The act of March 7, 1887, to provide for the organization and government of irrigation districts, has been repeatedly held constitutional, (Irrigation Dist. v. Williams, 76 Cal. 360, 18 Pac. Rep. 379; Irrigation Dist. v. De Lappe, 79 Cal. 351, 21 Pac. Rep. 825; In re Madera Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 296, 28 Pac. Rep. 272, 675); yet we can imagine the formation of an irrigation district under that statute with its boundaries confined to the limits of an incorporated city or to those of a swamp-land district, where irrigation would be productive of injury, and of no benefit. Should such a case arise, it may well be that it would be held that the facts showed that the case was not within the reason of the law, and hence not subject to its provisions. It would not, however, follow that the law was unconstitutional. So here it may well be that if, in the formation of a sanitary district, an incorporated city or town shall be included in which the authority conferred upon the sanitary board is delegated to the municipality, it will be held that the law under consideration was not intended to apply to such city or town. The illustration is only used by way of comparison to show that the act is not unconstitutional for the reason indicated by appellant, and not to indicate an opinion upon a case which may never arise. The statute in question is one coming clearly within the purview of the legislative power. All laws affecting the peace, good order, morals, and health of the community come within the "police power" of the legislative department of the state. Ex parte Shrader, 33 Cal. 279. It has been said: "There is also the general police power of the state, by which persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the state, of the perfect right in the legislature to do which (in the absence of constitutional restriction) no question ever was, or, upon acknowledged general principles, ever can be, made, so far as natural persons are concerned." Redfield, C. J., in Thorpe v. Railroad Co., 27 Vt. 140. With the advance of civilization and the increase of knowledge upon the subject of hygiene, the importance of sanitary laws is coming to be better understood, and their necessity more fully appreciated. Referable, as they are, to a conceded branch of the power vested in the lawmaking department of the government, few constitutional questions can arise over their exercise except such as relate to the mode of its exercise and the extent of its application. The well-considered and elaborate case of In re Madera Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 296, 28 Pac. Rep. 272, 675, disposes of and affirms the constitutionality of nearly every question involved in this case, and a further discussion of the subject is not deemed necessary. No point is made as to the regularity of the bonds, or as to the validity of the assessment, or levy of the tax in the sanitary district, except for the reasons hereinbefore specified. I am of the opinion the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

SMITH v. LOS ANGELES & P. R. CO.

(No. 19,252.)

ESTOPPEL—VOID ORDER—COLLATERAL ATTACK—
RES JUDICATA.

1. Where an order appointing a receiver of a corporation is void, a judgment creditor of the corporation does not, by intervening in the action for the purpose of enforcing his judgment, waive all objections to the order, and thereby lose the right to levy on the corporate property.

2. A void order may be attacked in any proceeding.

3. An order denying a motion to vacate a void order does not validate such void order.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by Smith against the Los Angeles & Pacific Railroad Company. An application for an order directing the sheriff to levy on sufficient property of defendant to satisfy a judgment theretofore obtained by plaintiff against defendant was denied, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

T. L. Winder and Chapman & Hendrick, for appellant. Anderson & Anderson, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. A receiver was appointed in the case of California Bank v. Los Angeles & Pacific R. R. Co. on September 13, 1889. On October 26, 1891, plaintiff herein filed a petition of intervention in that action, setting forth, among other things, that he had obtained a judgment against defendant herein for the sum of $4,403.30 on October 2, 1891, and that no part thereof had been paid. He prayed that his claim might be allowed against the corporation defendant, and that certain land belonging to the latter be sold, and the proceeds of the sale be applied to the payment of the debts of the corporation in such proportion as the court should determine. On July 11, 1892, he applied to the court for an order discharging the receiver, on the ground that said order was void, the court having no jurisdiction to make the same. The application was denied, and thereafter he applied to this court for a writ of certiorari to review the proceedings. A hearing was had, and judgment was entered denying the petition on the ground that the petitioner had lost his right to the relief prayed for by reason of his delay in making the application. Smith v. Superior Court, 97 Cal. 348, 32 Pac. Rep. 322. Subsequently, plaintiff applied in this action to the court below for an order directing the sheriff to levy upon sufficient property of the defendant in the hands of the receiver to satisfy his judgment. The motion was denied, and from the order this appeal was taken. Respondent contends that the order should be affirmed for the following reasons: By intervening in the Bank Case, for the purpose of enforcing his judgment, the plaintiff became a party to that action, and has ratified and consented to the appointment of the receiver, thereby waiving all right to question the order by which said receiver was appointed; that this is a collateral attack upon the order appointing the receiver; and that, as between the appellant and the respondent, said order is res adjudicata.

1. It is doubtless true that one may so conduct himself as to be estopped from repudiating the action of a receiver, although the order by which the receiver was appointed is void. But in this case mutuality, which is one of the essential elements of estoppel, is wanting. The plaintiff herein could not, by simply intervening in the other case, receive any benefit, and no one, certainly, was prejudiced by his action therein. The receiver was not appointed upon his suggestion. If there be any act tending to validate the order appointing the receiver, such act is the act of the court, and not of this plaintiff; but, as we shall see, the order was void. The action in which the receiver was appointed was brought against the corporation, the principal bondholders, and the trustee of the property mortgaged to secure payment of the bonds; but the clerk certifies that no summons appears among the files of the case, and that no entry of the same appears upon his register of actions, and the record shows that on June 7, 1891, the action was dismissed as to some of the parties. Inasmuch, therefore, as it appears that the plaintiff therein cannot avail itself of the services of the receiver, to hold that the plaintiff is not entitled to an execution herein is to decide that he has no remedy whatever for the enforcement of his judgment. We do not think that his conduct in the action referred to would warrant any such conclusion. Certainly, the California Bank ought not to be permitted, after practically abandoning the action for all purposes, to put the creditors in such a position that they can obtain no relief, either through the receiver, or by the ordinary processes of law.

2. This is not a direct attack upon the order appointing the receiver, but, the order being void, it may be disregarded. If the order is absolutely void, it is a nullity, and can be attacked in any proceeding. That it is absolutely void was clearly demonstrated when the matter was before the court, in department, in Smith v. Superior Court, supra.

3. As to the proposition that the order appointing the receiver is res adjudicata, it is sufficient to say, we think, that a court cannot, by an order denying a motion to set aside a void order, give the latter any vitality. If the order is void, it is void,—a mere nullity,—and may be treated as nothing. The decision of this court in the certiorari proceeding did not affirm the order of the court below. It declared that order void. It is true the proceedings were dismissed, but laches is the ground upon which the decision went; and the question whether the conduct of the plaintiff, as intervener, estops him from denying the validity of the order appointing the receiver, was not determined.

The order appealed from is reversed.

BOARD OF LAW LIBRARY TRUSTEES OF ORANGE COUNTY v. BOARD OF SUPRS OF ORANGE COUNTY. (No.
19,260.)

DELEGATION OF LEGISLATIVE POWER—COUNTIES—ESTABLISHMENT OF LAW LIBRARIES.

1. The legislature has power to provide, in an act establishing law libraries, (Act March 31, 1891,) that counties shall come or remain without the provision of the act, as the boards of supervisors of the respective counties may determine.

2. After the board of supervisors of a county has voted that Act March 31, 1891, establishing law libraries, shall be applicable to such county, it cannot evade the force and effect of the statute by repealing the adopting ordinance, since the county, after once coming within the provisions of the act, is there for all purposes, as fully and completely as if it had passed directly under the provision of the act at the date of its enactment.

3. The setting apart by the county board of supervisors of a few feet, for shelf room for a law library, in a large room occupied by the principal county officers, and by the board of supervisors when in session, where access to the books is obstructed, and rendered greatly inconvenient, by furniture and other articles occupying the room, and where the books cannot be consulted or used with reasonable convenience, is not providing such a library room for the use of the law library as is contemplated by Act March 31, 1891, providing for the establishment of law libraries in the different counties of the state.

In bank.

Application by the board of law library trustees of Orange county against the board of supervisors of Orange county for a writ of mandate to compel the board of supervisors to provide a suitable library room for its law library. Writ granted.

J. W. Towner, for petitioner. James G. Scarborough, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate. The matter is before us upon a demurrer to the petition, and the merits of the proceeding may be fully determined by a consideration of the facts relied upon by petitioner for the issuance of the writ. The writ is asked to issue against the board of supervisors of Orange county, requiring them to provide a library room for the use of the law library created under the statutes of this state. See St. 1891, p. 430. The petition alleges the establishment of the library as provided by the statute; that there is no suitable room for the use of said library; that the board of supervisors furnished some shelving, inclosed by doors, upon which the books were placed, in a large room, 100 feet by 25 feet, which was used by the principal county officers of the county for the performance of their official duties, and also for the meetings of the board of supervisors; that said room has no partitions, other than desks and railings; that said shelves are located on one side of said room, and about midway from front to rear thereof, and between the space occu-pled by the county clerk and county auditor; that access to the books is obstructed and rendered greatly inconvenient by furniture and other articles occupying said room; that the books cannot be consulted or used with reasonable convenience, or in any proper or satisfactory manner. The petition further states "that on the 5th day of May, 1891, said board of supervisors duly passed an ordinance, No. 14, and which is in the words and figures following: 'The board of supervisors of the county of Orange do ordain as follows: Section 1. The provisions of the act entitled "An act to establish law libraries," of the Laws of 1891 of the State of California, and approved March 31, 1891, are hereby made applicable to the county of Orange.'" It is further alleged that on the 16th day of May, 1893, the said board of supervisors undertook to repeal and annul said ordinance No. 14 by an ordinance, No. 23, which is in the words and figures following: "The board of supervisors of the county of Orange do ordain as follows: Section 1. Ordinance No. 14 of the county of Orange, entitled 'An ordinance making applicable to the county of Orange the act of the legislature of the state entitled "An act to establish law libraries,"' approved March 31, 1891, is hereby repealed." It is further stated that demand upon the board of supervisors has been made to provide a suitable room for such law library, but the demand has been refused. Section 9 of the act of 1891 provides: "The board of supervisors of any such county shall provide a library room for the use of such library, whenever such room may be demanded by such board of trustees" And section 14 contains the following provision: "And provided further that it shall be discretionary with the board of supervisors of any county to provide by ordinance for the application of the provisions of this act to such county." It will be observed that the board of supervisors, acting under the clause of the section last quoted, brought Orange county within the provisions of the act by passing the ordinance to which reference has been made. To defeat this application for the writ, it is insisted (1) that the act of 1891 is unconstitutional; (2) that the board of supervisors, by ordinance, repealed the prior ordinance bringing the county within the provisions of the act, and by reason of such repeal the county occupied the same position as if no ordinance had ever been passed; (3) the room furnished is sufficient for the purpose contemplated.

We think the legislature had the power to provide in the act that counties should come within or remain without the provisions of the act, as the boards of supervisors of the respective counties might determine. It is not necessary to enter into a discussion of the constitutionality of this law in that regard, for in the recent case of People v. McFadden, 81 Cal. 489, 22 Pac. Rep. 851, involving the constitutionality of the act creating the county of Orange, there is found an exhaustive discussion of the same principle, with the citation of many cases bearing upon the question. Among other things, it is there said: "Not only had the legislature the power to provide upon what condition or contingency the provisions of the act might be carried into effect, but also to provide within what time it must be done, if done at all."

It is also plain that the attempted repeal of the ordinance declaring Orange county within the provisions of the act was of no avail. When Orange county once came within the provisions of the act, it was there for all purposes; as fully and completely there as if it had passed directly under its provisions at the date of the enactment. We do not perceive how it can evade the force and effect of this statute of the state (which, after the passage of ordinance No. 14, applied to it) in any different manner or to any greater extent than it can escape the force and effect of any other statute of the state. If it can do so in this instance, it has the power to disorganize, for it was created under an act involving the same principle.

As to the third contention, from the facts recited we have no hesitancy in saying that the room used as a library room is not sufficient, and not such as is contemplated by the statute. The board should provide a suitable library room. The writ should issue, and it is so ordered.

SECURITY LOAN & TRUST CO. v. WILLAMETTE STEAM MILLS LUMBERING & MANUF'G CO. et al. (No. 14,903.)

TRADE FIXTURES—WHAT CONSTITUTE—ACTION FOR REMOVAL—EVIDENCE.

1. An owner of land leased it for, and it was used by the lessee as, a lumber yard. By the terms of the lease, part of the land was reserved for use in common by the lessor and lessee. By consent of the former, the latter erected on the reserved part a frame building, used as the lumber office, and as a place for some of the workmen to sleep. The lessee, to give access to the office, also built some bridges of stringers, with plank nailed thereto. Held, that such building and bridges were "trade fixtures," within the meaning of Civil Code, § 1019, which provides that a tenant may remove from the demised premises, during his term, anything affixed thereto for purposes of trade, etc.

2. In an action by the grantee of the lessor against the lessee for damages for removing such building and bridges during the term of the lease, it appeared that, during such term, defendant for a time held the legal title to the premises, but reconveyed them to the lessor and another. Held, that defendant might show that its deed was in fact a mortgage to secure it for money advanced to the lessor's grantor in payment for the premises at the lessor's request, that it never owned the fee, and that it paid rent during the entire term, since defendant's possession under the lease was sufficient to put the lessor's grantee on inquiry as to the real nature of the transaction.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William P. Wade, Judge.

Action by the Security Loan & Trust Company against the Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Manufacturing Company and others to recover damages for entry on plaintiff's land, and forcibly removing therefrom and converting to their own use a certain building and bridges. From a judgment for plaintiff against defendant company only, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, such defendant appeals. Reversed.

Sheldon Borden, for appellant. Geo. E. Harpham and R. H. Knight, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, J. This is an action brought by plaintiff to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the entry of defendants upon its lot, and forcibly removing therefrom, against its will, and wrongfully converting to their own use, a certain house, foundations, and bridges, which it is alleged were erected thereon, and attached to the freehold. Defendants in their answer admit the removal of the property from the plaintiff's lot, but aver their right to do so on the ground that they were trade fixtures erected by the defendant corporation during its occupancy of the premises as tenants under a lease from plaintiff's grantor, and that such removal was made before the termination of its tenancy thereunder. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and, upon the issues thus joined, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant corporation alone, from which judgment, and the order denying its motion for a new trial, it prosecutes this appeal.

The facts are as follows: On April 1, 1884, Jothan Bixby, then owner of the premises in question, entered into a contract in writing to sell and convey the same to Frank L. Stearns for $6,000, payable on or before April 1, 1887. Stearns entered into possession of the premises under this contract, which was never recorded, and on May 6, 1885, he executed to J. A. Russ a lease of the portion in dispute, for a lumber yard, for the term of five years from June 1, 1885. The lease contained a provision "that the balance of the land from Chavez street shall be used in common," and it was upon this latter portion of the premises that the house referred to was situated. The lease was duly acknowledged and recorded January 11, 1887, and on February 25, 1889, it was assigned by Russ to his principal, the defendant corporation, for whom it appears he acted as agent in the execution thereof. That in October, 1885, the building was erected, upon the suggestion of the lessor, by the defendant corporation, on that part of the premises reserved in the lease for the common use of the parties for office purposes, and was used by it as such in its business as a lumber dealer, for the sale of lumber and the transaction of its business in connection with its yard, and not otherwise, and that the said bridges were built to give access thereto. On the contract of sale from Bixby to Stearns of the premises in question are the following indorsements: "Deed made to J. A. Russ at request of Stearns for within-described property. Deed dated March 6, '87, and delivered April 1, 1887." This deed was recorded April 2, 1887. On March 3, 1888, Russ conveyed the premises to the defendant corporation. On April 20, 1888, the defendant corporation conveyed the premises to George L. and Frank L. Stearns. On January 6, 1890, George L. Stearns & Co. conveyed the premises to Frank L. Stearns and Mrs. Snyder, and on March 1, 1890, George L. and Frank L. Stearns, Mrs. E. M. Snyder, and the Stearns Manufacturing Company conveyed the same to plaintiff. That the defendant corporation was in the actual possession of the premises as tenant from the commencement of the lease up to the time of the removal of said property, and that it paid the rent therefor, according to the terms of the lease, up to June 1, 1890. That in 1887 it paid upon the lessor's demand an additional rent of $50 per month for the use of all that part of the land reserved by the terms of the lease to be used in common, and upon which the said building was erected, which rent was paid up to the date of the expiration of the lease, and that the property in controversy was removed by it therefrom prior to that time, and that during the whole of the term of the lease the defendant corporation was in the open, notorious, and exclusive possession of the leased premises.

Upon the facts stated, the important question arises whether the building and bridges were erected by the defendant for the purposes of trade, and were so used, or intended to be used, by it in connection with, and as accessory to, carrying on its business as a lumber dealer on the demised premises. If so, then they were "trade fixtures," within the meaning of section 1019 of the Civil Code,¹ and as such were removable by the tenant from the leased premises at any time during the continuance of its term, unless they were so physically annexed to the freehold that their removal could not be effected without injury to the premises, or that they, by the manner in which they were affixed, had become an integral part thereof. It is expressly stated in the lease that the premises were leased as a lumber yard, and the evidence shows that they were used as such during the term for which they were leased, and that the building was erected on that part of the land reserved by the terms of the lease to be used in common, with the knowledge and consent of the lessor, as an office for the purpose of carrying on its business as a lumber dealer; that the bridges were built to give access to the premises, and that they were so used from their erection up to the time of their removal. As to the character of the building and bridges, and the manner and purpose of their erection, Stearns, the original lessor and plaintiff's grantor, testified on behalf of plaintiff as follows: "The character of the building was one and a half story, good cornice and shingle roof, grate and fireplace and chimney in it, well put up and sealed inside. I don't think the chimney extended to the ground. I think there was blocking under the chimney and studding. The building was built upon the land in the ordinary way,—sills laid upon the ground, and short posts or underpinning on top of them, upon which the building rested. The bridges and foundations that were torn out were stringers across the zanja and plank nailed on them. I don't think the removal of the building injured the lot any, except by depriving it of the building. I know the purpose for which the building was erected. It was erected for a lumber office and a place to sleep, and the like of that. Two or three of Mr. Russ' men who worked in the lumber yard slept there. It was so used from the time it was built up to the time it was removed."

We think from this and other evidence upon the subject that it is conclusively shown that the building and bridges were "trade fixtures," within the meaning of the statute, and as such were removable by the defendant during its term, unless the character with which they were originally impressed was changed by their merger in the realty, by virtue of the deed from Bixby to Russ conveying the leased premises; and such a result would inevitably follow if during such time the ownership of the fee and of the personalty were united in Russ or his principal, the corporate defendant; in other words, the merger of personal property of this character in the realty, where nothing appears to show a contrary intention, necessarily results from the unity of title to the personal and real property. Defendant, for the purpose of showing there was no merger of the chattel in the realty, or of the leasehold interest in the legal title, introduced testimony tending to show that the corporate defendant did not acquire the ownership of the fee from Bixby; that the deed was in effect a mortgage executed by him to Russ (who acted as agent in the matter for the corporate defendant) at the request of Stearns, the lessor, to secure to the defendant corporation the payment of the balance of the purchase money due on the land, and advanced and paid by it to Bixby at the instance and request of and for the benefit of Stearns, upon an agreement that, when the money so advanced was repaid to it by Stearns, it would execute to him a conveyance of the premises; that afterwards Stearns repaid the money, and it conveyed the land to him and George L. Stearns, in pursuance of the agreement, and thereby discharged the mortgage; that during the entire term it was in the actual possession of the premises as tenant under the lease from Stearns, and paid the rent therefor, according to the terms thereof. This testimony was, on motion of plaintiff, stricken out by the court on the ground of want of notice on the part of plaintiff as to the real character of the various deeds and transfers as shown by this testimony, and that the defendant was bound by the record evidence of title. This ruling, which was excepted to, was clearly erroneous for the reason that the corporate defendant was in the actual possession and quiet enjoyment of the premises under the lease, and paying rent therefor according to its terms, at and prior to the time they were conveyed by Stearns to plaintiff, and that it continued in the occupancy thereof until the expiration of the lease. This possession was sufficient to put plaintiff on inquiry, and, if the inquiry had been made by plaintiff, it could easily have ascertained that the relation of landlord and tenant existing between Stearns and the defendant corporation continued without interruption up to the date of his conveyance of the premises to plaintiff; that it was in the actual possession thereof as tenant during the whole of the leased term, and that it paid the rent therefor during that time according to the terms thereof; that the corporate defendant held the legal title merely as security for money loaned by it to its landlord, and that its subsequent conveyance of the premises to the landlord was by way of discharging the mortgage; that the title to the trade fixtures was preserved separate and distinct from the title to the land, and that their character as such was never merged in the realty; that, when the conveyance was made by the corporate defendant to Stearns, no reservation was made as to the trade fixtures in the deed, because it was known and understood by all parties that they were personalty, and for that reason no mention of them in the deed was necessary; that Russ acted, during all the times mentioned, for and on behalf of the corporate defendant as its agent; that the nature of all of the transactions referred to, and which were consummated before the sale of the premises to the plaintiff, was perfectly understood by Stearns, as they were made upon suggestions emanating from him and in his own interest. It therefore follows that plaintiff had no right to rely on the record title alone in making the purchase, but that it was its duty, from the knowledge which it had of the defendant's possession, to act upon the inquiry suggested thereby, and to look beyond the record title for the purpose of ascertaining what rights and equities, if any, the corporate defendant had in the premises; and, as it failed to do this, the corporate defendant's possession thereof charged it with full knowledge of the true character of the transactions referred to, and of the rights and equities arising therefrom, and existing between the landlord and tenant, at the time of plaintiff's purchase of the land, and it took it subject to them. This testimony was perfectly competent for the purpose for which it was introduced, and, as the court erred in striking it out, it follows that the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

WATER RIGHTS—ACTUAL AND STATUTORY APPROPRIATIONS—PRIORITY.

1. A person by the actual diversion and appropriation of the water of a stream, acquires the right to its use as against a claimant who subsequently posts notices on such stream, as provided by Civil Code, § 1415, and proceeds, as required by statute, to perfect his rights.

2. Civil Code, §§ 1415, 1416, 1418, provide that a person desiring to appropriate water must post a written notice at the point of intended diversion, stating that he "claims" the water to the extent desired; that within 60 days thereafter the "claimant" must commence work; and that by a compliance with the above rules "claimant's" right to the use of the water relates back to the time notice was posted. Held, that Civil Code, § 1419, which provides that a failure to comply with such rules deprives the "claimants" of the right to the water as against a subsequent "claimant" who complies therewith, refers to a person posting the notice required by section 1415, and does not apply to an appropriator by actual diversion.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by J. M. Wells against John Mantes and others to restrain defendants from diverting the waters of a stream, and thereby depriving plaintiff of the use thereof. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. P. Meux and A. W. Thompson, for appellants. Sayle & Caldwell, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to restrain appellants from diverting the waters of a certain stream, and thereby depriving plaintiff of the use thereof. The plaintiff, by actual diversion, appropriated 2,500 inches of the water of the stream for the purpose of irrigation. Subsequently defendants, at a point a mile or more above plaintiff's place of diversion, posted notices in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Code, and proceeded to claim and appropriate the waters of the said stream, regardless of any rights of plaintiff to such waters obtained by virtue of his actual appropriation. The only question presented by this record is: Can a person, by the actual diversion and appropriation of water, obtain the right to the use thereof as against a claimant who subsequently posts his notices upon a stream, in accordance with section 1415 of the Civil Code, and proceeds thereafter, as required by the statute, to perfect his rights? We have no doubt but that an actual and complete appropriation of the waters of a running stream may be made without following the course laid down in the Civil Code. In De Necochea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 397, 20 Pac. Rep. 563, and 22 Pac. Rep. 198, which was subsequently followed in Burrows v. Burrows, 82 Cal. 564, 23 Pac. Rep. 146, it was decided that such an actual appropriation was good as against a subsequent pre-emptioner of the land upon which the spring was situated from which the appropriated water flowed. Such was declared to be the law by virtue of the amendatory act of congress of July 9, 1870, which, among other things, provided that "all patents granted, or pre-emptions or homesteads allowed, shall be subject to any vested or accrued water rights, or rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water rights, as may have been acquired under or recognized by the ninth section of the act of which this act is amendatory." It was held that, by virtue of the act of congress quoted, defendant took his title from the government with a servitude resting upon the land. The spring from which the stream flowed was situated upon the land pre-empted, and therefore was the property of the defendant, Curtis. In contesting De Necochea's right to the use of the water running from the spring, the pre-emptioner in no sense could be classed as a mere trespasser seeking to interfere with the rights of the party enjoying the actual possession of the water. The defendant, Curtis, occupied a position much stronger than as a mere subsequent appropriator, for as to such a one it is apparent at a glance he would have had no rights whatever. In order to defeat the defendant's claims in that litigation it was necessary to hold that the prior appropriator had a right to the use of the waters of the stream by virtue of his actual appropriation and possession, beyond that which was sufficient to defeat a mere intruder, for that term in no sense could be applied to the pre-emptioner, Curtis. If a right to the use of the water of the stream, merely sufficient to defend against a trespasser, would not have been sufficient to defeat the pre-emptioner, it follows necessarily that, the pre-emptioner being defeated in that case, the prior appropriator was recognized as possessing vested rights to the use of the water by actual diversion, and without complying with the provisions of the Code. It is substantially held in that case that, when the pre-emptioner took his title, he took it with a servitude upon the land; and this servitude was not created by complying with the statute as to the appropriation of water, but by an actual diversion alone. For these reasons we deem that case directly in point upon the question at bar.

As supporting the determination that a vested right to the use of water may be secured without invoking the provisions of the Code, it must be remembered that the congressional legislation quoted was enacted, as is said in Broder v. Water Co., 101 U. S. 276, for the purpose of recognizing pre-existing rights to the use of water, rather than establishing new rights. Again, we cannot bring ourselves to think that a mere subsequent appropriator under the Code occupies a better position than the pre-emptioner whose situation we have just been discussing, and whose rights to the waters of the stream we have held to be secondary to those of the prior appropriator. To say that the pre-emptioner has no rights against the prior appropriator, but that the subsequent appropriator, by posting notices, etc., has a superior right to the prior appropriator, we think inconsistent in the extreme. Such a practice would result in an unjust discrimination, and has no sound support in the law. If the prior appropriator has sufficient rights in the water to defeat the pre-emptioner, and we have decided such to be the case, he has sufficient right to defeat the subsequent appropriator under the Code. Section 1418 of the Civil Code reads: "By a compliance with the above rules the claimant's right to the use of the water relates back to the time the notice was posted;" and we think the scope and purpose of all the provisions of the chapter upon water rights was to establish a procedure for the claimants of the right to the use of water, whereby a certain definite time might be established as the date at which their title should accrue. In this connection we quote from De Necochea v. Curtis, wherein the court, speaking of this question, said: "In this provision we begin to see the purpose and object of the legislature, which, in our opinion, was merely to define with precision the conditions upon which the appropriator of water could have the advantage of the familiar doctrine of relation upon which it had always been held before the statute that one who gave sufficient notice of his intention to appropriate, and followed up his notice by diligent prosecution of the work, was upon its completion to be deemed an appropriator from the date of his notice, and was, therefore, prior in time and stronger in right than an intervening appropriator, notwithstanding his diversion of the water might be first completed." No possible injury can result from this construction of the statute. A party contemplating an appropriation of water from a stream is furnished with more definite information for his guidance as to the character and extent of the appropriation by an actual diversion than could be obtained from the notices provided by the statute.

To defeat the respondent's rights, appellants invoke section 1419 of the Civil Code, which reads: "A failure to comply with such rules deprives the claimants of the right to the use of the water as against a subsequent claimant who complies therewith." We think this provision does not refer to an appropriator by actual diversion, but only to claimants seeking the right to the use of water under the provisions of this chapter of the Code. This is made apparent by an examination of the preceding sections. Section 1415 provides: "A person desiring to appropriate water must post a notice in writing in a conspicuous place at the point of intended diversion, stating therein: that he claims the water there flowing to the extent," etc. Section 1416 reads: "Within sixty days after the notice is posted, the claimant must commence the excavation or construction of the works," etc. Section 1418 reads: "By a compliance with the above rules the claimant's right to the use of the water relates back to the time the notice was posted." It thus becomes apparent from these provisions that the word "claimants," as used in section 1419, refers to a party posting and recording the notices required by the provisions of section 1415, and does not apply to an appropriator by actual diversion. For the foregoing reasons it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

ANTHONY v. GRAND. (No. 19,256.)

APPEAL—DISMISSAL—SECOND APPEAL.

Following a stipulation filed in the supreme court that an appeal might be dismissed without prejudice to a new appeal, were written the words, "So ordered," with the names of four of the justices subscribed thereto, and the clerk entered in the minutes, "Appeal dismissed without prejudice," followed by the names of such justices. Held, that such appeal was thereby dismissed, and a second appeal taken on the next day should not be dismissed on the ground that a prior appeal was then pending, though the supreme court, after the second appeal was taken, inadvertently entered an order dismissing the first appeal absolutely.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrence, Judge.

Action by Adolph Anthony against Fred Grand, in which defendant appealed from a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Plaintiff moves to dismiss the appeal. Motion denied.

Trippet, Boone & Neale, for appellant. Utley, Thorp & Holcomb, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered against him in the superior court of San Diego county, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. It was taken by filing in the court below a proper notice and undertaking on February 10, 1893. The transcript was filed in this court on March 18, 1893. The respondent now moves to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that, when it was taken, another and prior appeal from the same judgment and order was pending and undisposed of in this court.

It appears that an appeal from the judgment and order entered and made in the action was properly taken by the defendant on December 22, 1892, but no transcript on that appeal was ever filed in this court. On February 3, 1893, the respondent filed notice of motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the transcript had not been filed within the time prescribed by rule 2 of the court. On February 9, 1893, the defendant and appellant filed in this court a paper signed by his attorneys, and dated February 7, 1893, by which he "stipulates and agrees that the appeal heretofore taken in the above-entitled cause * * * be dismissed, without prejudice to the taking of a new appeal, within the time allowed by law, by said defendant." Following this stipulation is written, "so ordered," with the names of the chief justice and three associate justices of the court subscribed thereto; and on filing the paper the clerk entered in the minutes of the court an order: "Appeal dismissed without prejudice. Beatty, C. J. De Haven, J. McFarland, J. Fitzgerald, J." On this order a remittitur was sent to the clerk of the court below on March 13th. On April 3d, respondent's motion was submitted to the court, then sitting at Los Angeles, and on April 7th an order was inadvertently made, dismissing the appeal absolutely. This inadvertence may have arisen from the fact that the case was erroneously numbered, and the plaintiff was named as appellant and the defendant as respondent, thus apparently showing a different case from that in which the appeal had already been dismissed. But, however this may be, it is clear that, when the order of February 9th was made, the appeal was in fact dismissed, and there was thereafter no appeal pending on which the order of April 7th could take effect. This being so, the second appeal was taken after the first had been dismissed without prejudice, and the respondent's motion must therefore be denied. So ordered.

VERMONT MARBLE CO. v. SUPERIOR
SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 15,418.)

INSOLVENCY—EFFECT OF ADJUDICATION ON LIEN ACQUIRED BY EXECUTION—DEATH OF INSOLVENT —EFFECT ON INSOLVENCY PROCEEDINGS.

1. A levy of execution on a debtor's property, prior to the filing of a petition in insolvency against him, gives the judgment creditor a lien on such property which is not divested by the debtor's subsequent adjudication of insolvency; Insolvent Act 1880, § 17, which provides that such adjudication dissolves any attachment made within one month next preceding the commencement of the insolvency proceedings, being equivalent to an express declaration that it does not affect liens of any other nature.

2. The death of a judgment debtor after execution levied will not affect the lien, or relieve the sheriff of his obligation to sell the property; Code Civil Proc. § 1505, providing that, if execution is actually levied on any property of the decedent before his death, the same may be sold for the satisfaction thereof, and the officer making the sale must account to the executor for any surplus in his hands.

3. Where an alleged insolvent dies before the return day of an application for his insolvency, the proceedings in insolvency abate, and orders that have been made therein cease to have any force.

In bank.

Petition by the Vermont Marble Company for a writ of review of certain orders of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, restraining the sheriff from selling the property levied on to satisfy a judgment rendered by respondent in petitioner's favor. Denied.

F. Wm. Reade, for petitioner. William A. Jordan, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The petitioner obtained a judgment in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, on the 31st of May, 1893, against William Black, for the sum of $3,710, and on the same day caused an execution thereon to be issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff, and by virtue thereof the sheriff levied upon and took into his possession certain personal property belonging to the defendant, and advertised the same to be sold on the 6th day of June, 1893. On the 3d day of June, 1893, certain creditors of Black filed their petition in the superior court that he be adjudged an insolvent debtor, and thereupon the court made an order appointing June 17th as the day for hearing the said petition, restraining him, in the mean time, from transferring any property, and from collecting or receiving any debts, and also forbidding his creditors from paying any debt to him, or delivering to him any property belonging to him, or to any person for his use. On the same day the court made the following order: "To J. J. McDade, sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco: Upon reading the petition of creditors praying that William Black be declared an insolvent debtor, and upon reading and filing the affidavit of J. F. Kennedy, presented in connection with said petition, it is hereby ordered that you refrain from selling any of the property of the said William Black by virtue of any writ of execution issued out of the suit entitled Vermont Marble Company vs. William Black, or any other suit, until the further order of this court. Dated June 3, 1893. J. V. Coffey, Judge." The said William Black died on the 5th day of June, 1893, and on the 17th of June, the return day of said application for his insolvency, the petitioner, upon notice of his motion to the petitioning creditors, moved the court to vacate the last-named order, restraining the sheriff from selling the property. The court denied the motion, whereupon the present application was made for a review of the aforesaid orders.

By the levy of the execution upon the property of Black, prior to the filing of the petition in insolvency against him, the petitioner herein acquired a lien upon that property which would not be divested by his subsequent adjudication of insolvency. Howe v. Insurance Co., 42 Cal. 533. In the absence of any statute, an adjudication in insolvency does not affect any lien upon the property of the insolvent existing at the institution of the proceedings for such adjudication, but the assignee takes the property of the insolvent subject to all such liens. Section 17 of the insolvent act of 1880 provides that the effect of the adjudication is to dissolve any attachment made within one month next preceding the commencement of the insolvency proceedings, and this designation is equivalent to an express declaration that it does not affect liens of any other nature. The subsequent death of the judgment debtor did not affect this lien of the petitioner, or relieve the sheriff from his obligation to sell the property. Section 1505, Code Civil Proc., provides that, "if execution is actually levied upon any property of the decedent before his death, the same may be sold for the satisfaction thereof; and the officer making the sale must account to the executor or administrator for any surplus in his hands." When the sheriff took the property into his custody under the execution, that property ceased to be subject to any control of the court in the proceedings in insolvency, and the court had no jurisdiction to make an order restraining the sheriff from selling the same. Proceedings in insolvency are purely statutory, and the court, in exercising its authority therein, is limited by the statute. Section 9 of the insolvent act gives to the court authority, upon the filing of the creditor's petition, to make an order "forbidding the payment of any debts, and the delivery of any property belonging to such debtor to him, or for his use, or the transfer of any property to him." This is the measure and limit of its power to restrain the creditors of the alleged insolvent, either by a general order, or by an order directed to any individual creditor.

The court had no jurisdiction to make the foregoing order restraining the sheriff from selling the property in question, and the order itself conferred no protection upon the sheriff. It was not made in the action in which the execution had issued, and it derived no more authority, by virtue of its having been made in the insolvency proceedings, than it would have had if made in any other proceeding. The superior court has no authority, merely by virtue of its general jurisdiction, to restrain the sheriff from selling property which he has advertised under an execution, issued upon a valid judgment. When a plaintiff has obtained his judgment, he is entitled to enforce it, unless it be set aside or modified in due course of law. Livermore v. Hodgkins, 54 Cal. 637. In an action against the sheriff for damages for refusing to execute the writ, the order would not constitute a defense, or afford him any protection. By the death of the alleged insolvent before the return day, the proceedings in insolvency abated, and with them the orders that had been made therein ceased to have any force. Acts of bankruptcy are analogous to torts, and, like proceedings against a defendant for a tort in which the cause of action does not survive, proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy abate upon his death. Frazier v. McDonald, 8 N. B. R. 237. As the orders sought to be reviewed herein have ceased to have any vitality by reason of the death of the alleged insolvent, an order of this court annulling them would be vain, and the application is for that reason denied.

FREEMAN v. GRISWOLD. (No. 19,157.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—DEFAULT BY PURCHASER—RECOVERY OF PURCHASE PRICE.

1. A covenant in an agreement to convey land, which provides that on noncompliance by the purchasers with the terms as to payment the seller shall be free from any obligation to convey, and the purchasers shall forfeit all right thereto, time being made of the essence of the contract, authorizes the seller to avoid the contract or not, at his option, and he is not bound to tender a deed except on payment of the price.

2. Where a land contract provides that, on noncompliance by the purchaser with the terms as to deferred payments, the seller shall be free from any obligation to convey, and the purchaser shall forfeit all rights thereunder, except a right to occupy the premises as a tenant of the seller so long as the sums paid are equivalent to an annual rent equal to 12 per cent. per annum of the price agreed on, with the right to purchase during such time, the seller, by bringing an action to recover the unpaid price, waives his right to treat the agreement to convey as void, and hence this clause, giving a right of occupancy for a certain time to the purchaser, which was to apply only in case of forfeiture, has no application.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by Daniel Freeman against Daniel Griswold. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. R. Dupuy, E. H. Bentley, and R. Dunnigan, for appellant. Henry Bleeker and Geo. I. Cochran, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action on a written contract entered into between the assignor of plaintiff and defendant for the sale and purchase of real estate, and is brought to recover a balance of $5,863.24 on account of the purchase price, and interest from August 2, 1887, at 10 per cent. per annum. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant prosecutes this appeal.

By the agreement which was entered into on the 2d day of August, 1887, R. F. Lotspeich, trustee, agreed to sell, and defendant, Daniel Griswold, agreed to buy, certain lots of land situate in the county of Los Angeles, at specified prices per acre, the purchase price of which amounted in the aggregate to $8,194.90. Of the purchase price defendant paid $2,331.66 at the execution of the agreement, and agreed to pay a like sum at the expiration of six months, and the residue at the end of one year from the date of the agreement, with interest at 10 per centum per annum. That portion of the agreement which gives rise to the principal contention here follows, and is in the following language: "In the event of a failure to comply with the terms hereof by the said party of the second part, the said party of the first part shall be released from all obligation in law or equity to convey said property, and said party of the second part shall forfeit all right thereto, except a right to occupy such premises as a tenant of party of the first part so long as the sums paid are equivalent to an annual rent equal to 12 per cent. per annum of the purchase price agreed on, and party of the second part shall have the right to purchase at any time during the continuance of said rental at original price and twelve per cent. interest. And the said party of the first part, on receiving such payment at the time and in the manner above mentioned, agrees to execute and deliver to said party of the second part, or to his assigns, a good and sufficient deed in form of grant, bargain, and sale. Time is the essence of this contract, and it is understood that the stipulations aforesaid apply to and bind the heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns of the respective parties." No payments have been made upon the contract except the $2,331.66 paid at the date of its execution.

According to the complaint and findings of the court, defendant asked for and received from Lotspeich an extension of time for payment of the residue of the purchase price until on or about December 10, 1889, when defendant refused to pay then or at any time, repudiated the contract, and declared himself no longer bound thereby. January 4, 1890, Lotspeich transferred, assigned, and conveyed the land and his interest in the agreement to the plaintiff herein. At the trial it was stipulated "that the contract set out in the complaint was admitted, and the assignment as set out in the complaint was admitted, * * * and the sole issue was stipulated to be as to the extension of time and waiver, as set out in the complaint." The cause was tried January 27, 1891. It is highly probable, judging from the foregoing stipulation, that the defendant at the trial sought to bring himself within the purview of the rule enunciated in Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. Rep. 280, to the effect that where time is made the essence of a contract for the sale of land, which contract provides for the execution of a deed at a given day upon the payment of a certain sum of money, and also provides for a forfeiture, and that in the event of a failure by the purchaser to comply with the terms of the contract the seller shall be released from all obligations to convey, and the purchaser shall forfeit all right thereto, then, and in such a case, the covenants to convey and to make payment are mutual and dependent, and, if neither party tenders performance on his part, or demands performance from the other on the day fixed, the contract is at an end, and cannot thereafter be enforced by either party. The covenants and agreements in the case at bar are, in effect, precisely similar to those set out in the agreement in Cleary v. Folger, supra, except as to the proviso here that the purchaser might become a tenant of the seller, and might subsequently purchase at the same price, but with an added rate of interest. Cleary v. Folger, so far as it held that in the absence of payment by the purchaser the seller was bound to tender a deed on the precise day named in the contract, and that, failing to do so, he could not thereafter, upon tender of a deed, recover the purchase money remaining unpaid, was not in conformity with the law as previously declared in like cases, and was to the extent indicated directly overruled in the later case of Newton v. Hull, 90 Cal. 487, 27 Pac. Rep. 429, decided after the case at bar was tried upon an opinion concurred in by a majority of the commissioners who participated in the opinion in Cleary v. Folger. We must hold here, as was held in Newton v. Hull, supra, and in Wilcoxson v. Stitt, 65 Cal. 596, 4 Pac. Rep. 629, as well as many others that might be cited, that a covenant in an agreement to convey land which provides that, in the event of a failure to comply by the purchasers with the terms as to payment, the seller shall be released from all obligations in law or equity to convey the land, and the purchaser shall forfeit all right thereto, time being made of the essence of the contract, is a covenant for the benefit of the vendor, and must be construed as authorizing him to avoid the contract or not, at his option, and does not authorize the vendee to take advantage of his own neglect in making payment and avoid such contract. It may be said here as was said in Newton v. Hull, supra: There is no provision in the agreement that the plaintiff should forfeit his right to the purchase money in case the defendant should fail to pay it on or before the day on which it became due, nor in case he failed to tender a deed on that day, or at any time before the defendant tendered payment of the purchase money. Plaintiff was not bound to tender a deed, except upon a tender of the purchase money. Smith v. Mohn, 87 Cal. 489, 25 Pac. Rep. 696; Wilcoxson v. Stitt, supra. Plaintiff could only be put in default by a tender of the purchase money and failure to deliver a deed, and as there is no claim that any such tender of purchase money was ever made we are bound to conclude that the plaintiff is entitled to recover under the contract, unless inhibited therefrom by the exception contained therein, which provides that upon a failure, etc., the party of the second part shall forfeit all right thereto, (to the property,) except a right to occupy the premises as a tenant of the party of the first part so long as the sums paid are equivalent to an annual rent of 12 per cent. per annum of the purchase price agreed to be paid, with the right on his part to purchase the land at any time during such tenancy at the price originally agreed upon, with interest thereon at 12 per cent. per annum. This clause is certainly peculiar. So far as we know, it is sui generis, and is probably an outgrowth of the boom period in which it originated. Twelve per cent. per annum on $8,194.90, the purchase price, would amount to $983.38 per annum, according to which calculation defendant would have been entitled to hold as a tenant, with the privilege of purchasing, for say 28 months. A careful examination of this clause in connection with the provision of forfeiture of which it is a part, and to which it is an exception, leads to the following conclusions:

1. If defendant failed to make payment of the purchase money as called for by the agreement, his vendor was at liberty to declare a forfeiture, refuse a conveyance, and retain the money already paid.

2. If the vendor declared such forfeiture, and refused a conveyance, defendant had a right, although he had not paid in full, to enter as a tenant, and to purchase, as hereinbefore specified.

3. If the vendor waived a forfeiture, as under a covenant for his own benefit he might well do, the exception, which only applied in case of forfeiture, had no application.

4. The vendor, by bringing an action to recover the purchase money remaining due and unpaid, waived his right under the contract to treat his agreement to convey as null and void, and hence the exception, which only applied in case of forfeiture, had no application.

If we are in error in these views of the force and effect of the contract, it still remains to be said that, the exception in the clause providing for a forfeiture, being for the benefit of defendant, and in the nature of an option, he was at liberty to avail himself of or to reject it, at his pleasure. According to the complaint and findings, which are supported by the testimony, he did repudiate the contract, and there is not in his answer or in the testimony any suggestion that he ever entered into possession as a tenant of his vendor, or claimed any right or evinced any desire so to do. It follows from these views that the demurrer to the amended complaint was properly overruled, and that the contentions of appellant upon the same questions as presented at the trial by numerous exceptions cannot be maintained. The assignment to plaintiff is averred in the complaint, and not denied by the answer. There was evidence in support of the findings, and it can serve no useful purpose to refer to them in detail. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. BALLERINO et al. (No. 19,036.)

DELINQUENT TAXES—COLLECTION—PENALTY—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. Under St. 1880, p. 136, providing that "any county, or city and county," where taxes are delinquent, may sue in its own name for the recovery thereof, "whether the same be for county or city, or city and county, and state purposes or taxes, or either of them," a county may sue for delinquent taxes levied for county purposes only; and defendant cannot claim that it ought also to have sued for delinquent state taxes, levied in the same year, and not to have split its demand, thus subjecting defendant to two actions, when it is not alleged in the answer that another action to recover the state taxes is pending, or has been prosecuted to judgment. Los Angeles County v. Ballerino, (Cal.) 32 Pac. Rep. 581, affirmed.

2. An action to recover delinquent taxes is not within Code Civil Proc. § 339, providing that an action "upon a contract obligation or liability not founded on an instrument in writing" must be brought within two years after the cause of action accrues, but it is within section 338, providing that an action on a liability created by statute, other than a penalty or forfeiture, must be brought within three years. Los Angeles County v. Ballerino, (Cal.) 32 Pac. Rep. 581, affirmed.

3. Pol. Code, § 3770, directs that 5 per cent. on the amount of the delinquent tax be collected in addition to such delinquent tax. Held, that the added per cent. is not such a penalty or forfeiture as is excepted from the operation of Code Civil Proc. § 338, or as falls within section 340, requiring an action "upon a statute for penalty or forfeiture, when the action is given to an individual and the state," to be brought within one year after the cause of action accrues; but the statute contemplates that it shall be collected at the same time and in the same manner as the delinquent tax, and the right to recover it is not lost until the cause of action on the delinquent tax is barred. Los Angeles County v. Ballerino, (Cal.) 32 Pac. Rep. 581, affirmed.

4. Where a party defends an action for delinquent taxes on the ground that his property was fraudulently assessed in excess of its real value, he must show by his answer that he has paid or tendered the amount which would have been due if his property had been assessed at a fair valuation, and he must offer to pay what the court shall find equitable and just; otherwise evidence cannot be admitted as to matters alleged in the answer in regard to the unjust discriminations made against him in the assessment. Los Angeles County v. Ballerino, (Cal.) 32 Pac. Rep. 581, affirmed.

On rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The points urged by appellant upon the reargument of this case have been fully considered by us, and we think the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed for the reasons given by us in the former opinion, filed herein on March 9, 1893, and that opinion will stand as the opinion of the court. Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BALLERINO et al. (No. 19,035.)

DELINQUENT TAXES—RECOVERY—ACTION BY STATE.

1. St. 1880, p. 136, providing that any county "may sue in its own name for the recovery of delinquent taxes," whether such taxes be for county and state purposes, or either of them, is not repugnant to Pol. Code, § 3899, authorizing actions for delinquent taxes to be brought in the name of the people in certain cases, so as to repeal it by implication, and therefore the authority of the county to sue is not exclusive.

2. Pol. Code, § 3899, provides that the comptroller may direct a tax collector to whom a delinquent list has been delivered not to proceed further with the collection of any tax on the list amounting to more than $300; and that, if there is no purchaser in good faith at such sale, the collector must deliver to the comptroller a certified copy of the entries on the delinquent list relative to such tax, whereupon an action to collect the same may be brought in the name of the state. Held, that the complaint must aver that the property had been once offered for sale, and a failure to do so is not cured by an averment that defendant had procured an injunction against the sale.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by the people of the state against Ballerino and others to recover delinquent taxes. There was a judgment in favor of the people, and defendant Ballerino appeals. Reversed.

Horace Allen, for appellant. James McLachlan, for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. This action is brought by the people of the state to recover the amount of taxes levied in the year 1888 for state purposes upon certain property of the defendant Ballerino, situate in the county of Los Angeles. The amount of the delinquent tax exceeds $300. The prayer of the complaint is for a judgment against defendant Ballerino for the amount of such tax, with 5 per cent. for delinquency, and also interest thereon, "and for a decree * * * that said real estate be sold as provided by law, and that out of the proceeds of such sale said tax so due * * * to said county * * * be paid." Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff in accordance with this prayer of the complaint, and the defendant Ballerino appeals.

By section 1 of "An act prescribing the form of complaints in actions to recover delinquent taxes, and to authorize the bringing of suits therefor," (St. 1880, p. 136, Bancroft Ed. p. 402,) it is provided that "any county, or city and county, where such taxes are delinquent, may sue in its own name for the recovery of delinquent taxes, whether the same be for county, or city and county and state purposes, or taxes, or either or them." The defendant contends that the authority thus given to the county, or city and county, is exclusive, and that the people of the state are not authorized to maintain such actions. We do not think this act should be so construed. Section 3899 of the Political Code authorizes an action to be brought in the name of the people of the state to recover delinquent taxes under certain circumstances. This section of the Political Code is not expressly repealed by the later act of 1880, just cited, and there is no such repugnancy between that section and the act referred to as will justify us in holding that the latter repeals the former by implication. The remedy given by the act of 1880 is more simple, but there is nothing in its language which expressly or by implication deprives the people of the state of the right to maintain an action for the collection of delinquent taxes under the provisions of section 3899 of the Political Code. The remedy given by the act of 1880 is cumulative, and not exclusive. But, while this is so, we are of the opinion that the complaint in this action does not state facts sufficient to entitle the people of the state to maintain this action under section 3899 of the Political Code. That section provides: "3899. The controller may, at any time after a delinquent list has been delivered to a collector, direct such collector not to proceed in the collection of any tax on said list, amounting to three hundred dollars, further than to offer for sale but once any property upon which such tax is a lien. Upon such direction the collector, after offering the property for sale once, and there being no purchaser in good faith, must make out and deliver to the controller a certified copy of the entries upon the delinquent list relative to such tax; and the tax collector or the controller, in case the tax collector refuses or neglects for fifteen days after being directed to bring suit for collection by the controller, may proceed by civil action in the proper court, and in the name of the people of the state of California, to collect such tax and costs." It is very clear that under this section the people of the state are not authorized to commence an action for the recovery of the delinquent tax until after the property upon which the tax is delinquent has been once offered for sale. This is made by the section a condition precedent to the right to maintain such an action, and it is not alleged in the complaint here that this condition was complied with, or that the controller ever directed the tax collector to only once offer such property for sale. The averment that the defendant procured a temporary injunction restraining the tax collector from selling the property for delinquent taxes, and that this injunction was not dissolved until May 19, 1890, does not cure the defect in the complaint just noticed. The statute having prescribed the conditions upon which alone the state may proceed by action, the performance of such conditions is essential to the right to maintain the action. The manner of collecting taxes rests with the legislature, and when the legislature has prescribed the particular mode, that procedure must be followed, unless it is apparent that it was not intended that such course of procedure should be exclusive. Cooley, Tax'n, pp. 13, 200; City of Camden v. Allen, 26 N. J. Law, 398. This principle was applied in the case of People v. Pico, 20 Cal. 595. Section 2 of the act of 1861 (St. 1861, p. 471) contained a provision that, "if the tax collector of the county shall fail to collect the delinquent taxes * * * by reason of his inability to find, seize or sell property belonging to the delinquent, it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the county to commence a civil action * * * to recover the unpaid taxes;" and the court in that case, construing this language, said: "No right of action or authority to bring an action under that act is given, except in cases in which the tax collector shall fail to collect the delinquent tax for the reason above mentioned. The complaint in this case, although averring the action to be brought in pursuance of the act, omits altogether to state the fact of the failure of the tax collector to collect the delinquent tax for the reason above specified, or for any reason. Without such an averment, the complaint shows no cause of action under that act." And this same rule was affirmed in the later case of People v. Holladay, 25 Cal. 301. We think it equally clear that section 3899 of the Political Code confers no right upon the people of the state to maintain such an action as this without at least once offering for sale the property upon which the tax is delinquent, in compliance with the terms of that section. The case of Oakland v. Whipple, 39 Cal. 112, does not conflict with this view. Section 33 of the act of April 24, 1862, (St. 1862, p. 337,) under which that action arose, conferred upon the district attorney the general authority to commence that action.

The question whether the citizen may be harassed and vexed by two suits to recover the amount of taxes levied for state and county purposes in one year upon property situate in one county,—that is, whether the state can maintain an action for its portion, and the county a separate action for the amount levied for county purposes,—is not raised by the answer in this case, and we express no opinion upon it.

Other points urged by counsel for defendant are disposed of adversely to his contention in the case of County of Los Angeles v. Ballerino, 34 Pac. Rep. 329, (19,036,) the decision in which has just been filed, and it is unnecessary to discuss them here. Judgment and order reversed.

FULTON v. JANSEN et al. (No. 19,130.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—FAILURE TO SHOW PART PERFORMANCE—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

Plaintiff, who purchased land, paying part cash, the balance payable within a year, under oral agreement that he should have a deed thereof on final payment, cut wood on the land for fuel, but never entered into possession. Before the year expired, his grantor conveyed the land to defendants, who verbally agreed to carry out his contract with plaintiff. Held an insufficient part performance by plaintiff to warrant a decree compelling defendants to convey the land to plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William P. Wade, Judge.

Action by Joseph Fulton against Christian Jansen and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

E. C. Bower and Reymert & Orfila, for appellants. A. R. Metcalfe, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought by the respondent to enforce the specific performance of a contract to convey certain real property situate in the county of Los Angeles. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from an order refusing a new trial, defendants appeal.

The findings of the court show, in substance, that on the 13th day of October, 1889, one Jason Brown was the owner of the land in dispute, and certain other land of which it was an undivided part. That said Brown, in the presence of defendants, and upon the land, pointed out to plaintiff certain boundaries defining the northerly portion of the tract, which he offered to sell to plaintiff, and plaintiff agreed to buy, for $450,—$200 in cash, and the remaining sum of $250 in one year, without interest; a deed to be executed and delivered when the final payment was made. Fulton, the plaintiff, paid the $200 to Brown on the following day, and received a receipt therefor from Brown. One hundred dollars of the amount so paid was borrowed from Christian Jansen, for which plaintiff gave a promissory note payable within 18 months, with interest. Plaintiff lived in a house near said land, upon which he entered, and thereafter cut wood upon it, and removed it to his house, where he used it for fuel. Defendants and plaintiff were at the time intimate friends, and they were present consulting and advising in relation to the purchase. On the 5th of November following, Brown conveyed the whole tract of land, including that sold to plaintiff herein, to the defendants, they agreeing on their part that they would carry out, with plaintiff, Brown's contract to convey to him. Plaintiff tendered the residue of the purchase money to defendants, and demanded from them a conveyance, which was refused. The agreement of Brown to convey to plaintiff, and that of defendants to carry out the same contract, were verbal, and no memorandum or agreement in writing was made or had.

The important questions in the case are these: (1) The contract between Brown and Fulton being for the sale of land, and not being in writing, was there such a part performance as to take the case out of the statute of frauds? (2) If not, does the case, as made, develop such a state of facts as to raise a resulting or a constructive trust in favor of plaintiff which will support the decree? The only evidence under this head tends to prove that the plaintiff paid part of the purchase price, and used the land in question so far as to cut and remove from it stovewood (but how much, or at how frequent intervals, or for how long a period, does not appear) for family use. This falls far short of making a case for specific performance. Forrester v. Flores, 64 Cal. 25, 28 Pac. Rep. 107. No improvements were made upon the property by plaintiff. The evidence did not show, and the court did not find, that plaintiff entered into possession of the property. In Forrester v. Flores, supra, it was said: "It is only where the payment is accompanied by a change of possession in the land, or the expenditure of money upon it on the faith of the oral agreement, and where the failure to perform by the vendor would work a gross fraud upon the vendee, that a court of equity will decree specific performance by compelling the execution of a deed. Story, Eq. Jur. § 761. For money paid under an invalid contract, the party who pays has an adequate remedy at law." It is concluded that there can be no specific performance of the oral contract to convey decreed upon the ground of such part performance as is shown in this case.

Resulting trusts and constructive trusts are such as arise by operation of law, and are by our Civil Code, § 2217, denominated "Involuntary trusts." Resulting trusts are such as arise where the legal estate in property is transferred or conveyed, but the interest appears, or it is inferred from the terms of the disposition, or from the accompanying facts and circumstances, that the beneficial interest is not to pass to, or be enjoyed with, the legal title. Familiar examples of this character of trusts are cases where property is conveyed by will or deed upon trusts, but no trusts are in fact declared, or where the trust, although in fact declared, has failed, or, where attempted to be declared, the declaration of trust is so imperfect that it cannot be carried into effect. Another example of a resulting trust occurs where a conveyance of property is made to A., the price or consideration being paid by B., whereupon, according to well-settled principles in equity, A. takes the title in trust for B. Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1037; Hidden v. Jordan, 21 Cal. 93; Bayles v. Baxter, 22 Cal. 575. Cases of this character are not within the statute of frauds, and may be proved and disproved by parol. In order to raise such resulting trust by payment of the purchase money, it is essential that the payment be actually made by the beneficiary, or that an absolute obligation to pay should be incurred by him, "as a part of the original transaction of purchase, at or before the time of the conveyance. No subsequent and entirely independent contract, intervention, or payment on his part would raise any resulting trust." Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1037. Where a part, only, of the purchase money is advanced by B., under like circumstances, a resulting trust pro tanto arises, and an allegation of such trust in a whole tract or parcel of land does not preclude proof of a trust in a part thereof. Osborne v. Endicott, 6 Cal. 149. This whole theory assumes that the conveyance to A. is made with the knowledge and consent, express or implied, of B., who pays the price, that the whole transaction is in pursuance of a common understanding or arrangement. "If the conveyance is taken by A. secretly, contrary to B.'s wishes, in violation of a duty owed to him, or in fraud of his rights, the trust which arises in B.'s favor is not resulting, but is a constructive trust." Note to section 1037, Pom. Eq. Jur., and cases there cited. And it matters not whether the conveyance be taken to one or several, whether jointly or severally, the trust results to the man who advances the purchase money. Constructive trusts arise in that class of cases where there is no intention of the parties to create a trust, and usually contrary to the intention of the party holding the legal title, and where there is no express or implied, written or verbal, declaration of a trust. "They arise when the legal title to property is obtained by a person in violation, express or implied, of some duty owed to the one who is equitably entitled, and when the property thus obtained is held in hostility to his beneficial rights of ownership." Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1044. In most cases of constructive trust, pure and simple, an element of fraud, actual or constructive, is the basis upon which the trust is founded. Equity sometimes proceeds upon the maxim that an intention to fulfill an obligation should be imputed, and assumes that the purchaser intended to act in pursuance of his fiduciary duty, as in case of a trustee who uses trust funds to pay for property purchased in his own name, though no doubt in many such cases the intention is to violate duty.

From the foregoing brief definitions of resulting and constructive trusts, it becomes apparent that the facts of the present case, as found by the court, and the evidence combined, causes it to fall within the principle of a resulting trust. The plaintiff in effect paid $200 of the purchase price. Although at the date of payment it was intended as a payment pro tanto for the land for which he had contracted, yet when the defendants subsequently purchased the whole tract, and agreed to convey to plaintiff that portion which he had agreed to purchase, this sum was deducted from the price paid, thus virtually placing plaintiff in the position of one who advanced a portion of the purchase money. We have said the facts as found by the court and the evidence combined show this condition of things. Unfortunately, however, for this theory, there is nothing either in the complaint or in the findings to support it. According to the complaint, plaintiff made a purchase of a tract of land, paid part of the purchase money, and was to pay the residue within one year.

His vendor then sold the land to defendants, who had full notice, and refused to consummate the transaction and convey the property, wherefore he seeks the specific performance of the contract. The findings show that the contract was verbal, and fail to show such part performance as to authorize a decree for specific performance. There is nothing averred in the complaint, or found by the court, which places the defendants in a different position from that which the original vendor would have occupied had he not conveyed. The evidence tends to show, not that defendants are liable as purchasers with notice, but that, by virtue of having advanced a portion of the purchase price, plaintiff acquired, as against them, a right not inherent in him as a purchaser, but which equity gives to him by virtue of his relation to the defendants, and devolves upon the latter a duty not arising in their character of purchasers, but growing out of the fact that in making such purchase they availed themselves of the money paid by plaintiff, out of which a new relation sprang, viz. that of trustee and beneficiary, or a resulting trust in favor of plaintiff. This new relation being foreign to anything contained in the pleading or findings, we are not authorized to invoke it, even in aid of the judgment. The order and judgment appealed from should be reversed, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his complaint, if he shall be so advised.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

GAROUTTE and McFARLAND, JJ. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his complaint, if he shall be so advised.

REED et al. v. NORTON. (No. 19,127.)
MECHANICS' LIENS—ENFORCEMENT—PLEADING AND PROOF.

Where the complaint in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien alleges that there was no contract between the owner and the person who erected the building, there can be no judgment on proof that there was, and it is error for the court, on finding the latter, and without an amendment, to render judgment for plaintiff to the extent of 25 per cent. of the contract price, which the owner failed to keep back, as required by the statute.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Consolidated actions by C. H. Reed and others against Thomas Norton and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendant Norton appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

Wm. Shipsey and Graves & Graves, for appellant. J. M. Wilcoxon, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is a consolidation of eight actions to foreclose liens under the mechanic's lien law against defendant Thomas Norton, the owner of the building in question, and Thomas Helm, original contractor. Judgment went for all the plaintiffs except Knight, and Norton appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The case was here on a former appeal. 90 Cal. 590, 26 Pac. Rep. 767, and 27 Pac. Rep. 426. At that time the trial court had held that the written contract between Norton and Helm was void for want of proper rec ordation, etc., and had given judgment for plaintiffs for the full amount of their claims, which amount exceeded 25 per cent. of the contract price. On that appeal this court held that errors had been committed with respect to two of the liens, (those of Smith & Waite and Knight,) but it also held that the court below erred in finding that the written contract between Norton and Helm was void, and for these reasons the judgment was reversed. In the opinion it was said that Norton did not retain, for 35 days, 25 per cent. of the contract price, and that "he is responsible to that extent, but no further, to those who make good their claim to it." But there was no point raised or decided as to the sufficiency of the complaints, as they then stood, to sustain judgments, upon the theory that there was a valid written contract between Norton and Helm. As a fact the complaints—all except that of Schwartz, Beebe & Co.—expressly aver that there was no contract between Norton and Helm. The averments are that the last-named persons did sign a written contract by which Helm was to construct the building for $5,500, but that neither the contract nor a memorandum thereof was recorded before the work was commenced, or at any time; and that Helm was merely the "agent" of Norton, and as such agent bought the materials for which the liens were filed. When the remittitur went down after the first appeal the complaints were not amended so as to aver a valid contract between defendants Norton and Helm; but for the purpose of further fortifying the original position, that there was no such valid contract, each of the complaints was amended by adding thereto a clause averring that "said defendants mutually agreed to, and did, abrogate, cancel, and annul said contract;" that, after work had been commenced, Norton filed in the recorder's office "what purported to be a memorandum thereof, but which was not a memorandum of the same;" and that they merely conspired together to pretend that the contract price was only $5,500, whereas the reasonable value of the materials and labor was $9,000. At the trial respondents first introduced, over the objection and exception of appellant, the written contract between Norton and Helm, and then immediately introduced the said Helm as a witness, who testified substantially that the contract was a mere sham; that Norton was to "run the job," and he (Helm) was "to work on it by the day;" that he "signed the contract in evidence merely as a guaranty that Norton would have a proper job done;" and that he (Helm) "never employed anybody to do anything on this building," "never hired a man nor discharged a man," and "did not buy any of the lumber that went into the building." But the court found that there was such a contract, and that a memorandum thereof was recorded; that Norton and Helm did not conspire to abrogate and annul, and did not abrogate and annul, said contract; that "all of said plaintiffs, and their several assignors, at all times while they, and each of them, were furnishing materials for, and performing labor upon, said building, treated said contract between said Norton and Helm as valid and subsisting;" that they made their contracts for materials and labor with said Helm individually, not as "agent;" that "at no time during the erection and construction of said building was defendant Helm otherwise connected therewith than as contractor, as aforesaid;" and that the plaintiffs, under said contract, are entitled to liens "for the payment to each of a pro rata portion of the sum of $1,375," which last sum is 25 per cent. of the said contract price of $5,500.

We do not see how the judgment can be affirmed without violating well-settled principles. "A plaintiff must recover, if at all, upon the cause of action set out in the complaint, and not upon some other, which may be developed by the proofs." Mondran v. Goux, 51 Cal. 151. "The consequence of a variance between the averments in a pleading and the proof are the same under our system of practice as at common law, except that they may be, to a great extent, obviated by amendments to pleadings, which are allowed with great liberality." Stout v. Shuster, 28 Cal. 65. See, also, Johnson v. Moss, 45 Cal. 515; Goss v. Strelitz, 54 Cal. 641. In the complaints in the case at bar the respondents' causes of action are based upon averments of facts which the findings show not to be true; and the judgment is based upon facts which are denied in the complaints. The allegata and probata, as shown by the findings, do not agree. In an action to enforce the lien of a mechanic or material man, the complaint must show, either that the building was constructed under a valid statutory contract, or that it was not; and a complaint upon the one theory will not warrant a judgment rendered upon the other. In their complaints respondents allege the facts, and go upon the theory that there was no contract, that they dealt directly with the owner of the building, and that he is liable for the whole of their claims. The court finds and proceeds upon the theory that these averments of respondents are not true, that there was a valid contract, and that respondents dealt directly with Helm as contractor, and not with Norton. The judgment must therefore be reversed. Upon the theory on which it was rendered, the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The respondents Schwartz, Beebe & Co. aver in their complaint that they sold the materials for which they claim their lien directly to the appellant, Norton, and contracted with him personally. The court finds this averment to be true. It also finds all the other issues as to the liens of these respondents in their favor; and, as there is a fair conflict of evidence as to these issues, the judgment, so far as it relates to these respondents, should stand. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and the cause remanded, except as to that part of the judgment which is in favor of respondents L. Schwartz, W. L. Beebe, and A. Jones, and, as to said last-named respondents, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HUNT v. WARD. (No. 19,152.)

CORPORATIONS—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. Though under the general rule, as expressed in the title of the statute of limitations, (Code Civil Proc. §§ 312-363,) actions can be commenced within the prescribed periods "after the cause of action has accrued," section 359 declares that the title does not affect actions against stockholders of a corporation to enforce a liability created by law, but that such actions must be brought within three years after "the liability was created," and therefore an action against a stockholder to enforce his liability for a debt of the corporation cannot be brought after three years after the debt was created, even though no cause of action may have accrued.

2. This is not affected by the clause of the constitution declaring the liability of stockholders of corporations, since the statement of a right in the constitution is always subject to reasonable statutory limitations of the time within which it may be enforced, unless the constitution itself otherwise declares.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by John W. Hunt against Edwin Ward. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Lee & Scott, for appellant. Wells, Monroe & Lee, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. Action to recover of defendant, Ward, his proportionate share of the alleged indebtedness of a corporation in which he was a stockholder. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, said defendant appeals.

Appellant contends, among other things, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the action is barred by section 359, Code Civil Proc. It is averred in the complaint that on February 20, 1888, a certain corporation called the Exchange Block Company made and delivered to respondent its promissory note for $7,500, payable one year after date, with 12 per cent. per annum interest, and also executed to respondent a mortgage on certain corporate property to secure said note; that afterwards respondent foreclosed said mortgage, and that after the sale of the mortgaged premises there was a deficiency of $3,291.50, for which judgment was docketed against said corporation on January 9, 1891, and that the same is wholly unsatisfied; and that during the times mentioned appellant owned such a number of shares of the corporate stock as would make his proportionate share of said deficiency judgment $827.50, for which last-mentioned sum judgment is prayed in this present action against appellant. It will be observed that there is no averment of the time of the incurring of the indebtedness or liability for which the note was given, or of the nature of such indebtedness,—the facts upon which it was founded; the only averment on the subject being the making and execution of the note and mortgage. The complaint bases the right to recover on the making of the note and the judgment against the corporation; but, as the liability of a stockholder is a separate and independent one, commencing with and dependent upon the original indebtedness, it is doubtful if the averments of the complaint in the case at bar are sufficient. Indeed, such averments were directly held by this court in Tilden v. Gashwiler, No. 4,053, decided in 1875, to be insufficient. In that case the complaint did aver that the corporation was indebted to plaintiff's assignor in a stated sum of money, and that in consideration of such indebtedness it made its promissory note, upon which it was sought to hold the stockholder; but the trial court sustained a general demurrer upon the ground that the liability of the stockholder was upon the original indebtedness, and not upon the note, and that there was no averment of facts showing such indebtedness. The plaintiff appealed, and the appellate court, after a most elaborate argument, as shown by the briefs in the record, affirmed the judgment. But as that case was not reported, and there was no written opinion delivered in it,—it being simply noticed in 50 Cal. 668, under the head of "Cases not Reported,"—it cannot be taken as known generally to the bar, and therefore should not have much, if any, weight as authority. We allude to it merely to show how the court viewed the question at that time, and to illustrate the possible danger of relying upon such averments as those contained in the complaint in the case at bar; and, as we think that appellant's plea of the statute of limitations is a perfect defense to this action, we prefer not to say more upon the question above suggested, leaving its final decision to some case in which it must necessarily be determined.

As the note of the corporation is alleged to have been made on February 20, 1888, the liability of the stockholder was created, under any view, at least as early as the date of the note; and this present action was not commenced within three years after that date. The statutes of limitation of this state are contained in tit. 2, part 2, Code Civil Proc. §§ 312-363; and the general rule, as expressed in said title, is that actions can be commenced within the prescribed periods after the cause of action shall have accrued. But section 359 provides that "this title does not affect actions against * * * stockholders of a corporation * * * to enforce a liability created by law; but such actions must be brought within three years after * * * the liability was created." And it was definitely settled in the cases of Green v. Beckman, 59 Cal. 545, and Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 167, 15 Pac. Rep. 670, that a stockholder's liability is a "liability created by law," within the meaning of said section 359. We do not see how this plain, clear language of section 359 can be explained away by any rule or any number of rules of construction. There is no room for the play of interpretation when the language under review leaves no doubt as to the meaning of those who used it. The legislature, having in former sections of said title 2 declared the general rule that actions should be commenced within the prescribed periods after the accruing of the cause of action, by section 359 deliberately provided that such rule should not apply to an action against a stockholder to enforce his liability for his proportionate share of the corporate debts, but that such action should be brought within three years after the liability was created. Of course, there is a clear and wide distinction between the creation of a liability and the accruing of a cause of action thereon, and section 359, ex industria, emphasizes that distinction. A liability may be absolute or contingent; it may be unconditional or limited; it may be presently enforceable by action, or there may be time given for its performance; but, whatever its character, it is created by the consummation of the contract, act, or omission by which the liability is incurred. If the appellant, before the maturity of the note, had sold his stock to a third person, who held it when the note matured, the appellant, and not the third person, would have been liable as a stockholder; which illustrates, if illustration be needed of a thing so plain, the meaning of the words, "after the liability was created," as used in said section 359.

It is sought to overcome the plain language of the Code by supposing a case where the corporation had given a note not due until more than three years after date, and suggesting that in such a case the statute would have run against the stockholders before the accruing of any right of action against them. But if we assume that in such a case, according to respondent's view, the stockholders could be sued only upon the note, still the situation—called by counsel "an anomalous condition of affairs"—would be the result of the voluntary act of the creditor done in the face of the law. Such a condition of affairs would not be the necessary outcome of the law, for the Code gives the creditor ample room and time to subject stockholders to their independent liability for the indebtedness of the corporation. But if he chooses to make a contract with the corporation, by which its payment of the indebtedness is postponed beyond the three-years limitation in favor of the stockholders, he simply does an act which practically waives his right against the latter,—assuming, of course, that his only cause of action against the stockholders is upon the note of the corporation. It must be remembered that the right to pursue the stockholder at all does not exist at common law, but is solely the creature of the written law; and that it must be exercised upon the conditions and within the limits which the written law prescribes. The invocation by respondent of the clause of the state constitution declaring the liability of stockholders of corporations does not strengthen his position, for the statement of a right in a constitution is always subject to reasonable statutory limitations of the time within which it may be enforced, unless otherwise declared in the constitution itself; and three years is certainly not an unreasonable period of limitation. We see, therefore, no reason for disregarding the plain language of section 359. We need not inquire into the policy of the section; but, as certificates of stock of many corporations pass frequently from hand to hand, it may well be assumed that the legislature intended to protect temporary stockholders from the power of officers of corporations and their creditors to indefinitely extend the enforcement of liabilities created while they happened to be holders of stock. If the policy be unwise or bad, it is for the legislature to change it.

No cases have been cited where the point here involved was before the court; the question is res integra. The case nearest in point is that of Redington v. Cornwell, 90 Cal. 63, 27 Pac. Rep. 40, where the corporation had given its promissory note in consideration of a mutual open account, and the court, in considering the application of the statute of limitation to stockholders, used this language: "The averment as to the mutual open account in the third amended complaint is of doubtful sufficiency to extend the period of limitation even against the corporation. As to the stockholders, it can have no effect whatever, even though sufficiently alleged. The corporation had no more power to extend the period of limitation as against the stockholders by a mutual open account than by making its promissory note. The liability of the stockholders is created and exists by statute. It arises when a debt is contracted by the corporation. It is limited to three years from the time it arises, and it is well settled in this state that the corporation has no power to extend that limitation without direct authority from the stockholders."

As the foregoing views are determinative of the case in favor of appellant, it is not necessary to discuss the admissibility in evidence of the judgment against the corporation, or any of the other questions argued by counsel. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded.

BANK OF SHASTA v. BOYD et al. (No. 18,149.)

ESTOPPEL—NOTE TO CORPORATION—PLEADING—SHAM ANSWER.

1. The maker of a note is estopped from denying that the payee is or was a corporation, by his having dealt with it as such, and received the consideration of the note.

2. Where it appears from the copies of a note and mortgage sued on, and which are set out in the complaint, that the action is not barred, an unverified answer setting up the statute of limitations, since it admits the due execution of the note and mortgage, is properly stricken out as sham.

3. In an action on a note made to plaintiff, an allegation in the complaint that plaintiff is the owner is unnecessary, and may be treated as surplusage, and a general denial raises no issue.

4. In an action on a note, an allegation in the complaint that it has not been paid is material, and, when the complaint is unverified, the issue of nonpayment is raised by a general denial, so that the answer cannot be stricken out as sham.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; W. T. Masten, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Shasta against James T. Boyd and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant James T. Boyd appeals. Reversed.

Spencer & Raker, for appellant. Clay W. Taylor, J. Chadbourne, and C. McClaskey, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. On August 4, 1884, the defendants made to plaintiff their joint and several promissory note for the sum of $2,- 000, payable two years after date, and at the same time, to secure the payment of said note, executed to plaintiff a mortgage on certain lands situate in the county of Lassen. This action was commenced in Lassen county on July 28, 1890, to foreclose the mortgage, and to obtain a personal judgment for deficiency, etc. Copies of the note and mortgage were set out in, and made parts of, the complaint. The complaint was not verified. James T. Boyd, for himself alone, filed and served the following,—an unverified answer: "(1) That he denies generally and specifically each and every allegation thereof contained in plaintiff's said complaint. (2) For a further and separate and second defense to plaintiff's complaint filed herein, the said defendant, James T. Boyd, alleges and avers as follows, to wit: That plaintiff's cause of action is barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California." Plaintiff's attorney moved, on the complaint and answer, to strike out this answer, on the grounds that it was "sham and irrelevant, because the allegations of the complaint are admitted," and "that said answer is not filed in good faith." The court granted the motion, and decreed a foreclosure, to all which defendant excepted. From this final decree the defendant James T. Boyd brings this appeal on the judgment roll, containing a bill of exceptions showing the facts above stated.

1. Counsel for appellant contend that the answer raised a material issue as to whether the plaintiff was a corporation. It is to be observed, in the first place, that the defendants, having dealt with plaintiff as a corporation, and received from it the consideration of the note, are estopped from denying that it was and is a corporation. Association v. Clark, 67 Cal. 634, 8 Pac. Rep. 445; Oregonian Ry. Co. v. Oregon Ry. & Nav. Co., 10 Sawy. 464, 22 Fed. Rep. 245; Cowell v. Springs Co., 100 U. S. 61; Close v. Glenwood Cemetery, 107 U. S. 466, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 267; Bigelow, Estop. pp. 527-529, and cases there cited; Mor. Corp. § 750; Spel. Corp. § 44. In the second place, as a general rule, the issue cannot be raised by a general denial of all allegations of the complaint, as in this case. Navigation Co. v. Wright, 8 Cal. 585; Steam-Boat Co. v. Sewall, 78 Me. 167, 3 Atl. Rep. 181; Mor. Corp. § 772; Spel. Corp. §§ 46, 47. To say that a plaintiff, suing as a corporation, is not a corporation, is to say it has not legal capacity to sue, and it is said this defense must be specially pleaded; but, inasmuch as defendants in this case were estopped from denying that plaintiff was a corporation, it is unnecessary to decide this question.

2. It is claimed that the plea of the statute of limitations tendered a material issue, and therefore should not have been stricken out. The ready answer to this is that on the face of the pleadings it appeared to be sham. Not being verified, the answer admitted the due execution of the note and mortgage, copies of which were set out in the complaint, by which it appeared that the plea was false, the action having been commenced within four years after the maturity of the note.

3. It is claimed that the answer raised a material issue as to the ownership of the note, which appears to have been made to plaintiff, not assigned to it. The allegation that the plaintiff was the owner of a note thus made was unnecessary, and therefore surplusage. It tendered no material issue, and the denial of it was therefore irrelevant. Corcoran v. Doll, 32 Cal. 83; Wedderspoon v. Rogers, Id. 570; Poorman v. Mills, 35 Cal. 119; Frost v. Harford, 40 Cal. 165; Monroe v. Fohl, 72 Cal. 568, 14 Pac. Rep. 514.

4. It is claimed that, since the complaint alleges that neither the interest nor the principal of the note had been paid, the answer raised a material issue on that allegation. It is well settled in this state that the allegation of nonpayment, in a complaint on a promissory note, is material to the cause of action, as without such an allegation no breach of the promise would appear; and that, when the complaint is not verified, a general denial puts in issue every material allegation of the complaint. I think the answer in this case raised a material issue as to payment, and therefore should not have been stricken out. Frisch v. Caler, 21 Cal. 71; Davanay v. Eggenhoff, 43 Cal. 395; Wetmore v. San Francisco, 44 Cal. 300; Bank v. Christensen, 51 Cal. 572. For this error I think the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

ADAIR v. WHITE et al. (No. 19,117.)

BOUNDARIES—EVIDENCE—APPEAL.

1. On the question of the location of a point called for in a patent and survey, the court may consider the field notes and description in the patent of an adjoining tract, the boundaries of the two tracts being coincident for a distance of several miles, and both having been surveyed by the same surveyor at about the same time.

2. On the question of the proper location of a point called for in a survey and patent, a finding by the court on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Action of ejectment by George M. Adair against Frank W. White and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Wilde, for appellant. Blackstock & Shepherd, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Ejectment for certain lands claimed to be a part of the Rancho Santa Paula y Saticoy, in Ventura county. The controlling question in the case is the location of the southerly line of the rancho. This line is set forth in the patent as follows: After leaving station S. P. 13, "thence S. 42, ¼ E., at 30 links enters bed of Santa Clara river, course S. W.; at 4 chains, intersects offset of township line in township 3 N., range 21 W., 39.50 chains east of corner to sections 10, 11, 14, and 15; at four chains and fifty links crosses river, and ascends; thence, along westerly slope of abrupt hills called 'Lomas de Santa Paula,' 492 chains, to stake marked 'S. P. 14' station, at the most southern point of above-named hills, known as the 'Punta de la Loma.'" When the case was here upon the former appeal (85 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. Rep. 663) it was said: "It will be observed that this line terminates at the most southern point of the hills called the 'Lomas de Santa Paula,' which point is known as the 'Punta de la Loma.' This is the natural object or monument, and the station S. P. 14 was there fixed and established by the calls of the patent. If this point can be found, it is only necessary to run a line from S. P. 13 to S. P. 14 to fix the southern boundary;" and the case was remanded for a new trial in accordance with this principle. When the cause came on again for trial in the court below, the greater portion of the testimony was directed to establishing the location of the point upon the Punta de la Loma at which S. P. 14 had been placed, and from the evidence before it the court found that this point was so located that a line drawn from it to S. P. 13 lay to the north of the lands occupied by the defendants, and thereupon rendered judgment in their favor. The position of station S. P. 14, as well as the significance of "Punta de la Loma," were questions of fact to be determined by the court from the evidence before it. There was a sharp conflict of evidence upon both of these questions, and, under the well-established rule, the finding of the trial court thereon must be held conclusive. It is only where there is no substantial evidence in support of a finding that this court can disregard the finding of the trial court; and after a careful examination of the record herein we are unable to say that the evidence before that court did not authorize it to make the findings which it has made upon both of these questions of fact. The stake that had been placed at the station had disappeared, and one of the objects at the trial was to re-establish this monument. Several surveyors were called as witnesses for the respective parties for the purpose of establishing the location of S. P. 14, and the conflict between their testimony arises chiefly from the construction given to the field notes and calls of the patent; the plaintiff contending that these notes call for the southernmost point of the Punta, or extremity of the hills, while the defendants contend that the Punta is itself designated as the southern extremity of the Lomas, or hills, and that the question to be determined was the position on the Punta at which the station S. P. 14 was originally placed. In his field notes of the survey, which were finally approved for the issuance of the patent, the surveyor describes the course from S. P. 13 as running in a direct line "along western slope of abrupt hills called 'Lomas de Santa Paula,' 492 chains, and to the most southern point of above-named hills known as the 'Punta de Loma,'" and states that he there "set stake marked 'S. P. 14;'" and, in the patent, the boundary of the ranch upon this course is described as "along westerly slope of abrupt hills called 'Lomas de Santa Paula,' 492 chains, to stake marked 'S. P. 14' station, at the most southern point of above-named hills, known as the 'Punta de Loma.'" It thus appears that the extremity of this course, and the station at which the stake marked "S. P. 14" was set, is "the most southern point of above-named hills, known as the 'Punta de la Loma,'" and the literal construction of the language used in its description makes "the above-named hills" include the entire Lomas de Santa Paula, and also makes the "Punta de la Loma" synonymous with the most southern extremity of the entire Lomas, so that the stake marked "S. P. 14" would have been set at the Punta of the Lomas, and not at the southernmost point of the Punta. The topography of the country along which this line extends is confirmatory of this construction. The Lomas de Santa Paula is a range of hills lying to the southeast of the Santa Clara river, and terminating where they enter the plain of the Santa Clara valley in a prominent headland called the "Punta de la Loma." The hills themselves are abrupt on their northerly or northwesterly side, with a gentle slope on their southerly side. This Punta or southern extremity of the hills has a face of about 200 feet, is oval in shape, and abrupt towards the north near the river, but with a gradual slope to the south and west. As the course itself runs along the axis of the hills, or nearly so,—the general trend of the hills from the Punta being about N., 50 deg. E.,—it was natural for the surveyor to terminate the course at the extremity of the hills; and as he designated the slope along which the course ran as the westerly, rather than the northwesterly, slope of the hills, he would also naturally designate the extremity of the hills to which he carried the course as the southernmost point thereof. His subsequent designation of that extremity as the "Punta de la Loma" was only for the purpose of adding another description to the one which he had already given, and is to be taken as synonymous with it. The court was therefore called upon to ascertain in what point of the Punta the station S. P. 14 had been placed, and was not required to place it at the southernmost point of the Punta itself. For this purpose it was proper to receive in evidence and consider the field notes and description in the patent for the adjoining rancho, Santa Clara del Norte. The boundaries of these two ranchos are coincident for a distance of several miles, and were surveyed by the same surveyor at about the same time, in December, 1860; and it appears from the field notes of the Rancho Santa Clara del Norte that the Santa Paula Rancho was first surveyed, the fifteenth course of the description of the Santa Clara Rancho reading: Thence "to stake marked 'S. P. 14,' a corner of Rancho Santa Paula y Saticoy, on point of hill known as the 'Punta del Loma,' mark stake 'S. C. N. 4,' and run along boundary of Rancho Santa Paula y Saticoy through sandy bottom." As the station S. C. N. 4 in this rancho was identical with S. P. 14 of the Santa Paula Rancho, it was competent to show the location of S. P. 14 by re-establishing S. C. N. 4, in accordance with the calls and monuments referred to in the patent for this rancho. If this station could be thus re-established, it would fix the place "on point of hill known as the 'Punta del Loma,'" which, had been designated as station "S. P. 14," and where the stake had been set. That the evidence introduced for this purpose tended to locate S. C. N. 4 at a point from which a line drawn to S. P. 13 would exclude the land of the defendants is not seriously controverted, and the finding of the court to that effect must be accepted as determinative of the proposition. Certain exceptions were taken to the rulings of the court in admitting evidence, but none of them are of such a character as to have affected the conclusion reached by the court. The judgment and order are affirmed.

STORKE v. STORKE. (No. 19,086.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—ACTION FOR SEPARATE MAINTENANCE—ALIMONY AND ATTORNEY'S FEES.

1. In an action by a wife for permanent support and maintenance, under Civil Code, § 137, an order allowing alimony and attorney's fees pendente lite may be made without awaiting determination of an issue raised by an answer alleging plaintiff's insanity, and praying the appointment of a guardian ad litem for her.

2. In an action by a wife for maintenance, after an appeal had been taken by defendant from an order for the payment of $50 per month alimony and $50 attorney's fees, the court made another order reciting the fact of appeal, and directing defendant to pay $350 "in lieu" of the $50 attorney's fees given by the first order, "to enable her to prosecute said action," but before notice of appeal from such second order changed it by striking out the provision that it was in lieu of the $50. Held, that the second order was a new order for further attorney's fees, and not a change of the first order after appeal therefrom.

3. In an action by a wife for permanent maintenance, an order that defendant pay plaintiff $50 per month alimony and $50 "to her attorney," while erroneous in directing such payment to her attorney, is no ground for reversal where it appears that the notice to show cause why the order should not be made was "to pay the clerk a certain sum of money, to be applied by plaintiff as counsel fees," since the direction to pay the attorney is a clerical error, and may be modified.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Action by Yda Addis Storke against C. A. Storke for permanent support and maintenance. From two orders directing the payment of alimony and attorney's fees pendente lite, defendant appeals. Modified.

W. P. Butcher and C. A. Storke, for appellant. Wright & Day, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The plaintiff brought this action against her husband, the defendant, for permanent support and maintenance, under section 137 of the Civil Code; and on August 12, 1891, the trial court made an order that during the pendency of the action defendant pay plaintiff $50 per month alimony and $50 to her attorney. From this order, on the day on which it was made, defendant appealed. Appellant had filed an answer averring the insanity of plaintiff, and praying for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for her; and the point made by appellant is that the court had no right to allow alimony until it had heard and determined the issue of insanity. But with respect to the allowance of alimony, the averment of insanity was not different from any other averment which, if proven at the trial, would have defeated respondent's action; and the very purpose of alimony in such a case is to give support to the wife, and enable her to conduct her side of the litigation pending the trial of the issues made by the pleadings. If the court were compelled to try and determine the issues in the case before it could allow alimony, the entire purpose of allowing alimony "during the pendency of such action" would be defeated. That part of the order which directs appellant to pay $50 "to the attorney for plaintiff" is irregular; but as the notice to appellant to show cause why the order should not be made was "to pay the said clerk a certain sum of money, to be applied by plaintiff as counsel fees in prosecuting the action," it is probable that the direction to pay the money to the attorney was a mere clerical mistake, and we think it a proper case for a modification of that part of the order, rather than a reversal.

There is in the printed record what purports to be another appeal by appellant from another order of the court made August 14, 1891. On that day the court made an order reciting the fact that defendant had appealed from the order of August 12th, and directing that appellant pay respondent $350, "to enable her to prosecute said action." This order, as first entered, declared that the $350 was "in lieu" of the $50 attorney's fee given by the order of August 12th; but four days afterwards the court modified the said order of August 14th by striking out the provision that the $350 was in lieu of the $50. Nearly two months afterwards—on October 12, 1891—the defendant gave notice of appeal from the order of August 14th, and the point made on this appeal is that the court had no jurisdiction to change the order of August 12th, after an appeal had been taken therefrom, by substituting $350 for $50. But we see nothing in the point, because, before the notice of appeal, the "lien" clause had been stricken out of the order, and it stood as a new order for further counsel fees. We have noticed this point on its merits, but it is doubtful if there is any record here which presents it.

The court below is directed to modify the order of August 12, 1891, by requiring the $50 attorney's fee to be paid to plaintiff, and, as thus modified, the order is affirmed, with costs of appeal to respondent. The order of August 14th is affirmed.

MASKELL v. BARKER. (No. 19,187.)
WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—WHEN ACTION LIES—INCOMPLETE LEVY.

There can be no recovery for the malicious suing out of a writ of attachment against real estate without probable cause, when it does not appear that it was fully executed, as required by Code Civil Proc. § 542, and that a copy of the writ, description of the property, and notice were left with the occupant of the property, or posted thereon, as well as filed with the recorder of the county.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. P. Wade, Judge.

Hugh J. & Wm. Crawford, for appellant. A. M. Stephens, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, J. This is an appeal upon the judgment roll from a judgment on demurrer to the complaint. The action is for damages, and the complaint, in substance, alleges that the defendant maliciously and without probable cause sued out a writ of attachment against plaintiff's property, and extorted from him the money sued for, upon a threat made by defendant that if the same was not paid he would cause the writ to be levied on certain real property of the plaintiff which he was about to sell, and thereby defeat the consummation of such sale; that the writ was delivered for levy to a constable, who, in obedience to its command, filed with the county recorder a copy thereof, with a description of said property, and a notice that it was attached. It is further alleged that, in consequence of these acts of the defendant and the constable, a notice was published in a certain newspaper that said property was attached, and a similar notice was transmitted to the various commercial agencies of this state, to the injury of the plaintiff's good name and business reputation, thereby causing great anxiety and distress of mind and mental suffering, to his damage in the sum of $5,500. The complaint was demurred to on the ground, among others, that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained by the court, and its ruling in this respect is brought in question by this appeal. In order to entitle a plaintiff to recover in an action of this character, he must allege and prove that the writ of attachment was executed by attaching his property. The alleged acts of the constable in this case do not constitute a levy, within the meaning of section 542, Code Civil Proc. What he did was but a step in that direction. "Leaving a similar copy of the writ, description, and notice with the occupant of the property, if there is one; if not, then by posting the same in a conspicuous place on the property attached,"—was necessary to complete the levy, therefore indispensable to the execution of the writ. The malicious suing out of a writ of attachment without probable cause, without levying it upon the property of the party against whom it was issued, will not authorize a recovery by such party. In addition to this, it does not appear that the defendant caused or was connected in any way with the notices published and transmitted, as alleged in the complaint. We are of the opinion that the demurrer was properly sustained. Let the judgment be affirmed.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 939, permitting an appeal within a year of entry of judgment, but inhibiting consideration of an exception to the decision, as being unsupported by evidence, unless the appeal is within 60 days after rendition of judgment, the evidence cannot be considered on an appeal taken after the 60 days.

Action by Thomas Nelmes against James G. Wilson. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gould & Stanford, for appellant. Johnson & Rodman, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action is brought to annul a contract for the purchase of a lot of land in the city of Pasadena, county of Los Angeles, entered into between the assignor of plaintiff and grantor of defendant on the 31st day of August, 1887, and to recover back so much of the purchase money as has been paid on account of such contract. Defendant answered, admitting the execution of the contract, and denying most of the other allegations of the complaint. He also filed a cross complaint, asking for the specific performance of such contract, and judgment for the amount remaining due thereon. At the trial a nonsuit was ordered against plaintiff, and defendant had final judgment in his favor as prayed for in his cross complaint. The appeal is from the final judgment, supported by a bill of exceptions. Said judgment was rendered February 13, 1892, but not entered until March 8, 1892. The appeal was taken May 6, 1892, more than 60 days after the rendition of the judgment, and within 60 days of its entry. Section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an appeal may be taken from a final judgment commenced in the court in which the same is rendered within one year after the entry of judgment. "But an exception to the decision or verdict on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence cannot be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment, unless the appeal is taken within sixty days after the rendition of the judgment." Under the rule enunciated in Schurtz v. Romer, 81 Cal. 244, 22 Pac. Rep. 657, we are precluded from reviewing the evidence contained in the bill of exceptions for the reason that the appeal was not taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment. The record fails to show that any exception was taken to the action of the court in granting the nonsuit. An error in granting a nonsuit is an error in law, and must be excepted to, or it will not be reviewed on appeal. Malone v. Beardsley, 92 Cal. 150, 28 Pac. Rep. 218; Flashner v. Waldron, 86 Cal. 211, 24 Pac. Rep. 1063; Warner v. Darrow, 91 Cal. 310, 27 Pac. Rep. 737. The findings are within the issues made by the pleadings, and support the judgment. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

HARRALSON v. BARRETT et al. (No. 19,137.)

MORTGAGES — PROVISION FOR PAYMENT OF TAXES ON MORTGAGE OR DEBT THEREBY SECURED — VALIDITY — REVIEW ON APPEAL — CONFLICTING EVIDENCE — NEW TRIAL — MONEY PAID UNDER MISTAKE OF LAW.

1. Under Const. art. 13, § 5, declaring that contracts obligating a debtor to pay a tax on money loaned, or on any mortgage, shall be void as to any interest specified therein and as to such tax, a provision in a mortgage that, in case of foreclosure, the mortgagee may include therein all payments made by the mortgagee for "taxes of this mortgage, or the money hereby secured," is void.

2. Where the evidence is conflicting, the verdict will not be disturbed on appeal.

3. In an action to foreclose a mortgage, defendants claimed that alterations had been made after execution, and plaintiff testified that he went, immediately after the acknowledgment, from the notary's office to the recorder's office. Defendants, after judgment for plaintiff, moved for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence that the mortgage was acknowledged at least an hour before it was recorded, and that one P., who occupied a part of the office of defendant, saw plaintiff make alterations after acknowledgment. Held, that where, from the issue, defendants had reason to believe that plaintiff would deny that the alterations were made after execution, they failed to use due diligence in getting such evidence, and the motion for new trial was properly overruled.

4. Though payment of the interest on the note secured by such mortgage could not be recovered because of the void provision therein, yet, where defendants voluntarily paid such interest under a mistaken belief that they were bound to do so, they cannot recover it back, or demand that it be credited on the principal of the loan.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by Harralson against A. W. Barrett and another to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Modified.

Henry Bleeker and George Denis, for appellants. A. M. Stephens, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The mortgage upon which this action was brought provides that in case of foreclosure the mortgagee may include therein all payments made by the mortgagee "for taxes on said premises, and the taxes of this mortgage, or the money hereby secured." It is claimed by appellants that this provision of the mortgage is void, and that the court below erred in allowing interest on the note for the payment of which the mortgage was given as security, and this proposition, we think, must be sustained. Section 5, art. 13, of our constitution provides that "every contract hereafter made, by which a debtor is obligated to pay any tax or assessment on money loaned, or on any mortgage, deed of trust, or other lien, shall, as to any interest specified therein, and as to such tax or assessment, be null and void." To hold that the clause of the mortgage quoted above is valid would defeat the purposes of this provision. In Hewitt v. Dean, 91 Cal. 11, 27 Pac. Rep. 423, Mr. Justice Harrison has clearly set forth the purposes of this provision of the constitution and the circumstances which led to its adoption. The end it attempts to accomplish is "that a portion of the taxes might be collected from the mortgagee, and that the burden upon the mortgagor might not at the same time be increased. A construction such as the respondent seeks to put upon the provision would afford the borrower no relief whatever, for under it the mortgagee could in any case make an agreement that, on his payment of the mortgage tax, it might be added to the indebtedness due him, and collected as a part of the same." Marye v. Hart, 76 Cal. 291, 13 Pac. Rep. 325, cited and relied upon by respondent, is not in point. The contract there was entirely different from the one before us. It simply provided that the mortgagee might discharge "at maturity all taxes or assessments, liens, or other incumbrances now subsisting, or hereafter to be laid or imposed, upon said lot of land or premises, and which may be in effect a charge thereupon;" and that such payments should be considered as secured by the mortgage. This provision was held to be entirely consistent with the provisions of section 4, art. 13, of the constitution, which allows the owner of the security to pay the taxes on the property, in which case they become a part of the debt, but does not allow the owner of the security to add the taxes paid by him on his own security to the mortgage debt. It says: "The tax so levied upon the property affected thereby shall become a part of the debt." The section provides for two assessments,—one upon the property, which must be against the owner of the land, and one upon the mortgage, which must be against the owner of the mortgage. It permits the mortgagee, if he pay the tax on the land,—and this is frequently done to protect himself,—to add the amount thereof to the mortgage debt. Section 5 clearly intends that the tax on the security shall be the debt of the mortgagee, and provides a severe penalty in case of any attempt to put the burden upon the borrower.

It was set up in the answer, and claimed at the trial, that, after the execution and delivery of the mortgage, "the plaintiff, without the consent of the defendants, or either of them, intentionally altered said mortgage by striking out the words 'other than,' * * * and inserting in place thereof the word 'and.'" The respondent claims that the change was made by him with the full knowledge and consent of the appellants. The clause is the one hereinbefore referred to, and as originally written or printed in the mortgage read as follows: "And for taxes on said premises other than the taxes of this mortgage, or the money hereby secured." The court found that no alterations were made by the plaintiff after the execution of the instrument, and that it was executed and delivered to the defendants in the form claimed by the plaintiff. There being a substantial conflict of evidence, we cannot disturb the finding. In the testimony of the plaintiff and the defendant Yoakum there is a sharp conflict; plaintiff testifying that he called the attention of Yoakum to the defects in the mortgage, and that the changes were made at the suggestion of the latter, while Yoakum testified that he never authorized the plaintiff to erase the words "other than," and write in lieu thereof the word "and," and knew nothing whatever of such change having been made. So far as the defendant Barrett is concerned, the preponderance of the evidence, as shown by the record, seems to be in his favor, but we cannot say there is not sufficient evidence to support the finding. The plaintiff testified that the changes in the mortgage were all made by him at the same time. The defendant Barrett admits that the changes in black ink were made before he signed the mortgage, but denies that the erasure of the words "other than," and the insertion of the word "and," in red ink, were in the instrument at that time. He says: "I did not sign the mortgage until it was complete. After all modifications were made, they came back to our side of the house, and I signed it. Then the document was acknowledged." If the court below believed the statement of the plaintiff that the changes were all made at the same time, it was natural to conclude that the defendant Barrett was mistaken in saying that the changes in red ink were not there when he executed the instrument.

The defendants moved for a new trial on the grounds of newly-discovered evidence. Among other things they showed by affidavit that the mortgage was acknowledged at least an hour before it was recorded. This was material, in view of the statement of the plaintiff that he went, immediately after the acknowledgment, from the notary's office to the office of the recorder. It was shown by the affidavit of one Pavkovich that the plaintiff, after the acknowledgment, returned to the office of Yoakum, "sat down near Mr. Barrett's desk, and appeared to be reading it over carefully. While in his hands, affiant saw him take a pen in his hand, and either write something in the mortgage, or erase something that was already in the mortgage." This, of course, was material. But while the evidence offered was material, and not merely cumulative, the court below must have believed that the defendants had not used due diligence in attempting to discover this evidence before the conclusion of the trial. Generally, newly-discovered evidence after defeat is looked upon with suspicion, and the appellate court is always reluctant to interfere with the ruling of the court below on a motion for a new trial on this ground. There must be a clear abuse of discretion. We cannot say that there was such an abuse in this case. The defendants had reason to believe from the issue that the plaintiff would deny that the changes were made after execution. His opportunity, therefore, to make such changes without the knowledge of the defendants, and before it was recorded, was naturally a subject of inquiry. When and where were the changes made? The notary's book would show the time when the instrument was acknowledged, and the recorder's book would show the time of recording. Pavkovich occupied a part of the apartment rented by the defendant Yoakum at the time of the transaction, and stated that Barrett and Yoakum were present in his office most of that day. He was so close to the parties he heard them negotiating about the loan. The court below doubtless thought the defendants ought to have inquired before the conclusion of the trial as to what, if anything, Pavkovich knew about the transaction.

The court found that the sum of $360 had been paid on account of interest on the note, and appellant claims that this amount should be credited on the principal of the loan, if the court should find, as we do find, that the clause with respect to payment of taxes on the mortgage prevents the plaintiff, under the provision of the constitution quoted above, from recovering interest. The defendants were not bound to pay to the plaintiff any interest on the note. The payment of $360 was a voluntary payment. If it was made under a mistake of law, it cannot be recovered, nor can it be allowed as a credit other than as contemplated when the payment was made. Upon the finding of the court the case stands in this way: There is a clause in the mortgage for the payment by the mortgagors of the mortgage tax. This clause, being invalid under section 5 of article 13 of the constitution, supra, releases the mortgagors from any obligation to pay the interest stipulated in the note. The provision was inserted in the constitution for the benefit of the borrower, but it is a benefit which he may waive if he sees fit, and, if he voluntarily fulfills his promise to pay interest, it is through a mistake of law on his part, or a waiver of a known right. In either case he is bound by his own act. The respondent suggests that the decree should not be reversed, but simply modified, in case the court should hold that the plaintiff was not entitled to enforce the stipulation as to interest. In support of this contention it is stated that the appeal was not taken until after the sale, and that the land was sold under the decree for less than the principal of the note. But there is nothing in the record to substantiate these statements,—nothing about a sale. The findings show, however, that the amount allowed plaintiff by the decree should be reduced in the sum of $883.63, that being the amount of interest improperly allowed by the court below. The judgment, therefore, can be modified without a reversal. The cause is remanded to the court below, with instructions to modify the decree in accordance with this opinion.

BANEGAS et al. v. BRACKETT (No. 19,123.)

VACATION OF JUDGMENT—WHEN ALLOWABLE.

Under Code Civil Proc. § 473, providing that the court may relieve a party from a judgment or order taken against him through his mistake, surprise, or excusable neglect, provided that application be made within a reasonable time, but in no case more than six months after the judgment or order, the court which rendered a judgment or order has no power on an ex parte motion to set it aside 13 months after its rendition.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by one Brackett against Manuel Banegas and J. W. Lucas. From an order setting aside a decree and allowing the filing of a supplemental complaint making Nieves Banegas a party defendant, and from an order refusing to vacate the same, said Manuel and Nieves Banegas appeal. Reversed.

Menzies C. Cleveland and J. B. Mannix, for appellants. Sprigg & Barber and Patterson & Sprigg, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The respondent filed his complaint against Manuel Banegas, the appellant, and J. W. Lucas, for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed to him by said Manuel; and upon the default of Lucas and the answer of Banegas the cause was tried, and judgment rendered in favor of the respondent March 9, 1891. Upon this judgment an order of sale was issued March 14th, and the mortgaged premises sold to the plaintiff for the amount of the judgment April 6, 1891, and the order of sale and judgment returned satisfied. On the 13th of April, 1892, upon the ex parte application of the plaintiff in said action, respondent herein, the court made an order "that all subsequent proceedings herein after the service of summons and the return thereof upon defendants Manuel Banegas and J. W. Lucas be, and the same are, set aside, and said decree opened, without prejudice to the rights of the plaintiff in said decree of foreclosure, and that plaintiff be, and he is hereby, allowed to file an amended and supplemental complaint herein." Thereafter the plaintiff filed an amended complaint, making Nieves Banegas a party defendant, and a summons was issued thereon, and served upon Manuel and Nieves. These two defendants thereupon made a motion to set aside the aforesaid order and the summons issued therein, and to strike from the files the said amended complaint, upon the grounds that the court had no jurisdiction to make the said order, and that the same had been made without any notice to the defendants, or either of them. The court denied the motion, and the said defendants have appealed from the original order, and also from the order refusing to vacate the same.

Section 473, Code Civil Proc., provides that the court may relieve a party "from a judgment, order or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect; provided that application therefor be made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after such judgment, order or proceeding was taken." Under the provisions of a statute in New York similar to this, it is held that a party in whose favor judgment has been rendered is entitled to relief the same as though the judgment had been rendered against him; that the statute is intended to be remedial, and should receive a liberal interpretation. Montgomery v. Ellis, 6 How. Pr. 326. See, also, Code Civil Proc. § 4; Downing v. Still, 43 Mo. 309. Under the common law a court could amend, modify, or vacate its judgment at any time during the term at which it was rendered; and this power could be exercised of its own motion, and without any notice to the party affected thereby. Having the absolute control over its judgment during the term, it was immaterial whether the party had notice or not. But by the adjournment of the term the court lost all control over its judgments, unless its jurisdiction was preserved by some motion or appropriate proceeding within the term upon which the hearing might be continued to a point after the adjournment of the term. The decision upon such motion had relation to the time within the term when the motion was made, and operated as an order made at that time. This rule was established in this state at a very early day, (Baldwin v. Kramer, 2 Cal. 582,) and was rigidly followed until changed by statute, (Morrison v. Dapman, 3 Cal. 255; Lurvey v. Wells, 4 Cal. 106; Carpentier v. Hart, 5 Cal. 406; Shaw v. McGregor, 8 Cal. 521; Bell v. Thompson, 19 Cal. 706; Casement v. Ringgold, 28 Cal. 335.) Under the provisions of section 68 of the practice act, (corresponding to section 473, Code Civil Proc.) as originally enacted in 1851, the court could relieve a party from a judgment taken against him only during the term at which it was rendered; but in 1853 the section was amended so as to authorize the court to relieve a party from a judgment taken against him to the extent of allowing him to answer to the merits of the original action at any time within six months after the rendition of the judgment, if he had not been personally served with the summons and a copy of the complaint. In 1866 (St. 1865-66, p. 843) the section was still further amended by providing that "when for any cause satisfactory to the court or the judge at chambers, the party aggrieved has been unable to apply for the relief sought during the term at which such judgment, order or proceeding complained of was taken, the court or the judge at chambers in vacation may grant the relief upon application made within a reasonable time, not exceeding five months after the adjournment of the term." The section as thus amended was re-enacted in section 473, Code Civil Proc., upon the adoption of the Codes in 1872, and in 1874 the period of time within which such relief might be granted was extended to "not exceeding six months after the adjournment of the term." Upon the adoption of the present constitution, terms of court were abolished, and at the first session of the legislature thereafter section 473 was amended in its present form for the purpose of adapting it to the provisions of the constitution. The legislature does not attempt to define "a reasonable time," as that would depend upon the circumstances of each case, but by declaring that it shall in no case exceed six months after the judgment was taken it has precluded the court from exercising this power in any case, unless the application therefor shall be made within six months after the judgment was taken.

In the present case the plaintiff did not make his application to set aside the judgment until more than 13 months after its entry, and at that time the court was without authority to grant him the relief he asked. By section 1049, Code Civil Proc., the cause had then ceased to be pending in the court, and the court was without any jurisdiction to render any further judgment therein. It was said in Carpentier v. Hart, supra: "Upon the adjournment of the term the court loses all control over cases decided, unless its jurisdiction is saved by some motion or proceeding at the time, except in the single case provided by statute where the summons has not been served, in which the party is allowed six months to move to set the judgment aside. The reason for this rule is obvious. There must be some finality in legal proceedings, and a period beyond which they cannot extend. The safety and tranquility of parties require that their interest should not be constantly suspended, and their repose liable to be disturbed at any moment by the discretion of the court. * * * The court lost all jurisdiction in the matter. The case was effectually out of court, and could not be reinstated, except, perhaps, by the consent of parties." By the judgment as originally entered herein the obligation of the mortgagor to the plaintiff had become fixed at a certain amount, bearing interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum. If, however, the court could at any time thereafter vacate this judgment after it had been satisfied, without any notice to the mortgagor, and re-establish the original obligation against him, bearing interest at the rate of 18 per cent. per annum, its judgment would not have been "a final determination of the rights of the parties," and the parties to the action could never feel secure in any action of the court. For the reason that the law does not sanction such injustice, it has been wisely determined by the legislature that the court shall have no power upon a mere motion to vacate its judgment after the lapse of six months from its entry. The orders appealed from are reversed.

MOORE v. MOTT et al. (No. 19,158.)

ATTACHMENT—ACTION ON BOND—JUDGMENT—PRESUMPTION.

In an action on a bond given to secure release of attached property, conditioned for liability in case judgment was rendered against defendant in attachment, a finding that a judgment was not rendered is not warranted where, in the record of the attachment suit subsequent to a judgment of nonsuit, appears a judgment for plaintiff therein, as to the legality of which there is no evidence, there being a presumption in its favor.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. N. Clark, Judge.

Action by Alfred Moore against S. H. Mott and W. C. Furney. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

S. B. Gordon, for appellant. John D. Bicknell, J. W. Swanwick, and A. W. Hutton, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action is upon an undertaking given to procure the release of property from an attachment. The writ was issued in an action brought by Alfred Moore, as plaintiff, against one Dorward. The undertaking is in the form prescribed by statute, and a copy is attached to the complaint. It recites the issuance and levy of the attachment, that the defendant had applied to the court for an order releasing and discharging the property from the operation of the attachment, and that the court had fixed the value of the property attached at $1,200; and in consideration of the premises the sureties (defendants herein) undertook and promised that, in case the plaintiff recovered judgment, defendants would, on demand, redeliver the attached property to the sheriff, to be applied to the payment of the judgment, or, in default thereof, the sureties would pay, on demand, to the plaintiff, the sum of $1,200. It is averred in the complaint that plaintiff, on the 8th of November, 1889, recovered a judgment against the said Dorward, in the said attachment suit, for $831.63, and that due demand had been made on said defendants for payment. The defendants, appearing by their respective counsel, (1) deny that plaintiff did recover judgment in the attachment suit against Dorward; and (2) aver that, in said attachment suit, Dorward recovered judgment against the plaintiff, wherein it was adjudged that the plaintiff take nothing by his said action, and that said Dorward recover his costs, which were therein taxed at $27.50; and that on the 10th of July, 1889, said Alfred Moore paid said judgment in full; and that since such payment no action has been pending in favor of said Moore against said Dorward. And it is contended that, if such were the facts, the judgment upon which the plaintiff depends was absolutely void, and also that defendants were discharged from their obligation on said undertaking by said judgment and its payment. The case was tried without a jury, and among other facts the court found: "(3) That plaintiff did not, prior to July 10, 1889, nor on or about the 8th day of November, 1889, nor at any other time, recover any judgment in said action against said Dorward, or in any other action, as alleged in the complaint, or otherwise; nor was any such judgment in favor of the plaintiff, Moore, ever entered or docketed in the office of the clerk of Los Angeles county at any time."

Upon the motion for a new trial it is contended that this finding was not sustained by the evidence. The sufficiency of the specification is complained of principally, as it seems to me, because more is stated than was necessary. The finding includes but one fact, and the specification is that the finding is not sustained by the evidence. It then proceeds unnecessarily to state what the evidence did show in relation to that issue. Though not required, this did not vitiate the specification. From the transcript it appears that plaintiff put in evidence a judgment in the case of Moore v. Dorward, dated November 8, 1889, and docketed November 12, 1889. In this judgment it is recited that the cause "came regularly on for trial on the 8th day of November, 1889, M. Whaling, attorney, appearing for plaintiff; and a supplemental complaint having been filed and served upon defendant's attorney, and no answer or demurrer having been filed, and the time allowed by law for answering or demurring having expired, a default of the defendants for failing to answer or demur to plaintiff's supplemental complaint was duly entered. And plaintiff produced his proofs as to his amended complaint filed and answered, and it appearing therefrom that there is now due and unpaid plaintiff Alfred Moore from the defendant, W. W. Dorward, the sum of $31.63," etc., judgment was thereupon entered against said Dorward for that sum, with costs. It is recited in the transcript, "which judgment was duly entered and docketed November 12, 1889, the record of which plaintiff then introduced in evidence." No judgment roll is found in the transcript. Plaintiff then proved execution issued on said judgment, which was returned unsatisfied, and then rested. Defendants then introduced a judgment roll in the same action,—the attachment suit,—in which judgment it is recited that the "case came on regularly for trial on the 24th of May, 1889, Michael Whaling appearing for the plaintiff, and Reymert, Orfila & Reymert for defendant. * * * Whereupon witnesses on the part of plaintiff were duly sworn and examined, and documentary evidence introduced, and it appearing from the testimony of plaintiff himself that no cause of action existed at the time of the commencement of this action, whereupon the defendant, Dorward, moved the court for a judgment of nonsuit, * * * and after due deliberation thereof the court grants said motion, the plaintiff having failed upon said trial to prove a case for the court, and the court orders a judgment of nonsuit to be entered herein." Whereupon it was "ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said plaintiff is hereby nonsuited, and that plaintiff take nothing by said action," and costs were awarded to Dorward, amounting to $27.50. Although it is recited that the judgment roll was introduced in evidence, none is found in the statement. Defendants also introduced an execution on said judgment, and the return of the sheriff showing that it had been levied on the real property of Moore, June 12, 1889, and was paid in full by Moore, July 10, 1889. They also proved that Dorward left the state soon after May, and before August, 1889, and has never returned. Defendants then rested, and, in rebuttal, plaintiff proved that in the attachment suit he gave notice of a motion for a new trial, served on Reymert, Orfila & Reymert, as Dorward's attorneys, June 1, 1889, and which was filed on the same day; that a statement on a motion for a new trial in the same case was served June 13th, and was settled and certified as correct on the 26th of June, of the same year; and that, on the 19th of September, 1889, a stipulation was filed, entitled in said cause, signed by Reymert, Orfila & Reymert, as attorneys for Dorward, "that plaintiff may have granted his motion for a new trial." Plaintiff failed to prove that an order granting a new trial was made otherwise than by the second judgment, which he contends conclusively shows that the first judgment was vacated in some lawful mode. In the absence of any bill of exceptions, or other showing to impeach the action of the court, the fact that a second judgment is found in the judgment roll, or upon the records of the court, presumes that it is rightly there, and in any proceeding in which such judgment is collaterally presented it must be assumed as a valid act of the court. Paige v. Roeding, 96 Cal. 388, 31 Pac. Rep. 264; Water Co. v. Swartz, (Cal.) 33 Pac. Rep. 878. It follows, therefore, that the third finding is not sustained by the evidence, and for this reason the court should have granted a new trial. The order is reversed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by N. W. Stowell against W. J. Waddingham and others for an injunction. An injunction was granted, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Harris & Gregg, for appellants. William Gird, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This case resembles Miller v. Waddingham, 91 Cal. 377, 27 Pac. Rep. 750. In fact, the building contract is the same in both cases. Clubine contracted with the defendant Newman to build certain houses, six upon land he had contracted to purchase from Miller, and six on the land purchased from plaintiff. The buildings were alike, and all were building at the same time. Clubine had a contract with plaintiff to purchase from plaintiff about 20 acres of land in the town of Ontario. He was not given possession under the contract, except that he was authorized to divide the land into blocks and lots. He might sell lots at not less than a fixed price, and plaintiff would make the deeds and receive the purchase money. The contract price for the land was $18,500, and the plaintiff testified that he had received of this about $5,000. Clubine failed to make the payments agreed upon, and asked for an extension of time, and promised to have some buildings erected upon the land, and thereupon the time was extended. The contract price for the buildings to be erected by Newman upon the land purchased from Stowell was $4,100, payable in weekly installments. Newman furnished all materials, and did all the work. After the houses had all been commenced, and were from one-eighth to one-fourth completed, Clubine failed to make payments, and informed Newman that he could make no more. Seven hundred dollars only had been paid. It was then agreed between Clubine and Newman that Newman should finish the buildings, and that he should own them unless they were paid for. Under this arrangement the houses were all completed by Newman. Plaintiff testified that he knew nothing of this arrangement between Newman and Clubine; that he did not object to the construction of the houses, but was anxious to have them built. It does not appear that Newman was aware of the understanding between Clubine and the plaintiff. The houses rested upon mudsills placed upon the surface of the ground, and plaintiff testified that upon their removal the land was left substantially as it was before their erection. Newman, after the completion of his contract, filed a claim for a mechanic's and material man's lien upon the houses, but afterwards, as they were not paid for, sold them to the defendant Waddingham, who commenced their removal on Saturday night,

STOWELL v. WADDINGHAM et al. (No. 19,166.)

INJUNCTION—MORTGAGES—WASTE—HIGHWAYS.

1. The owner of houses, after they have been removed from his land onto a public street, cannot maintain a suit to enjoin their removal, as he has an adequate remedy at law.

2. Where houses on mortgaged land have been removed therefrom, they are personalty, however they may have been removed, and are no longer under the operation of the mortgage lien, and the mortgagee cannot therefore maintain a suit to enjoin their further removal.

3. The fact that they have been removed into a public street on which the land abuts, and not beyond the center line thereof, does not render their location still on the land, on the ground that the owner of land abutting on a street owns the land over which the street runs to the center line thereof, as he has no and worked with a body of men all night and all day Sunday. Plaintiff appeared upon the ground while the work of removal was going on, and forbade it, and on the following Monday commenced this action enjoining the work. At that time all the houses had been removed from the premises into the streets, where they still are, except one, which was taken away. The finding upon the subject is as follows: "(12) That all of said houses in said paragraph mentioned and described were at the time this action was brought, and still are, in the public streets and highways of Ontario, in said county of San Bernardino, resting upon blocking, rollers, and moving appliances, which were placed under said buildings by said Waddingham for the purpose of removing said lumber, but upon land the title to which is in N. W. Stowell. Said houses were all so removed into said streets and highways by defendant Waddingham, but not beyond the center lines of any of said highways bordering said premises described in plaintiff's amended complaint."

The complaint avers, and it is found, that, deprived of the buildings, the land constitutes insufficient security for the money still due plaintiff upon his contract for the sale of the land. If it be admitted that, under the circumstances, plaintiff was the legal owner of the houses, he had an adequate remedy at law; but, whether owner or mortgagee, this action to stay waste cannot be maintained. It was commenced too late; the waste had already been committed. He had no right to stop the buildings in the public highway. Buckout v. Swift, 27 Cal. 433. In that case the plaintiff was mortgagee, and the house was a part of the land when the mortgage was executed. The premises were in Sacramento, and the house was moved by the great flood of 1862 into the street, a short distance from the lot. There it was purchased by Lowell with a full notice of plaintiff's mortgage. The court said: "So far as legal effect is concerned, it matters not whether the severance is by act of God or the act of man. The severance proprio vigore changed the character of the property from real to personal, irrespective of the means by which it was accomplished." It was also said that, by the removal of the house from the premises, "the house was effectually removed from the operation of the mortgage lien." Plaintiff's counsel claims that Stowell's position is that of a mortgagee. In such case his lien was effectually destroyed by the removal of the houses. But, whether he was owner or mortgagee, this suit cannot be maintained.

Respondent's counsel does not appear to dispute this general proposition, but he contends that, inasmuch as plaintiff is the owner of the land over which the street runs to the center line of it,—as to that boundary the mortgaged premises extend,—the houses, though severed from the land, are still on the premises, and subject to his lien. Conceding, for the purposes of the case, that a suit could be maintained although the fixtures had been severed from the land, put upon rollers and wheels, and were being moved off from the premises, but were not yet entirely off, such a case is not made by the facts. The owner of land, over which a public highway has been established, has no right to place his buildings there in such a way as to obstruct the highway, nor has he any right, as such owner, in anything in transit over the highway. He cannot interfere with persons using the street simply because he owns the land subject to the public easement. Property being carried over the street is no more on his premises there than it would be miles away. I think the order appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

TAXATION—EQUALIZATION—NOTICE—WRIT OF REVIEW.

1. An order of the board of equalization finding that a bank has omitted property from the list of its taxable property, and should be assessed thereon, and directing the assessor to add such property to its assessment, is not an attempt by the board to add property to the list, and exercise assessorial powers, but is a direction that the assessor make such addition, though the order specifies the value of the property to be added, and is authorized by Pol. Code, § 3681, requiring the assessor, at the request of the board, to list and assess property which he has failed to assess.

2. Pol. Code, § 3681, under which the assessor is required, at the request of the board of equalization, to list and assess property which he has failed to assess, which section the city charter of Los Angeles makes applicable to the common council, sitting as a board of equalization, does not conflict with the constitutional provisions which define the powers and duties of state and county boards of equalization, and which do not give the power to cause property to be added to the assessment list, since it merely extends the power and duty of the assessor.

3. A notice to a bank to appear before the board of equalization, and show cause why its "assessment on solvent credits should not be increased from $2,774 to $275,000," sufficiently informs it that it is proposed to add property to the assessment.

4. A person appearing before the board of equalization in response to a notice, and submitting to the action of the board, waives any defect in the notice.

5. A finding by the board of equalization that a person has omitted taxable property from his list to a certain amount is conclusive on the courts on writ of review, since Code Civil Proc. § 1074, provides that the review on such writ cannot be extended further than to determine whether the inferior tribunal or board has regularly pursued its authority.

6. Even if the fact that property has been so omitted is necessary to give the board jurisdiction, the court cannot review the evidence to determine whether there was evidence to show such fact, since the fact is one to be determined by the board.

Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Board of Equalization, 32 Pac. Rep. 312, 97 Cal. 318, followed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William P. Wade, Judge.

Petitions by the Security Savings Bank & Trust Company, Main Street Savings Bank & Trust Company, and Los Angeles Savings Bank for a writ to review an order of the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county, sitting as a board of equalization, directing property to be added to the assessments of petitioners. From a judgment annulling the order the board appeals. Reversed.

James McLachlan, Waldo M. York, and B. M. Marble, for appellant. Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. In Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Board of Equalization, 97 Cal. 318, 32 Pac. Rep. 312, most of the questions involved in this appeal were determined adversely to the respondent. The additional point now presented, that the legislature could not confer upon the state board of equalization authority to extend the time within which the county board of equalization could act, must also, under the principles declared in that case, be determined against the respondent; and, upon the authority of that case, the judgment is reversed.

DE CAMP LUMBER CO. v. TOLHURST et ux., (WOODWORTH COMMERCIAL CO., Intervener.) (No. 19,182.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—ATTORNEYS' FEES.

Code Civil Proc. § 1184, relating to mechanics' liens, requires that "25 per cent. of the whole contract price shall be made payable at least 35 days after the final completion of the contract. Sections 1193, 1195, authorize a claimant, on establishing his lien, to recover costs and an attorney's fee. Held, in an action by a material man to enforce his claim against the 25 per cent. of the contract price retained by the owner, that the costs and attorney's fee are chargeable against the premises where the sum so retained was not sufficient to satisfy the claim, and the contractor suffered a default, while the owner contested the claim.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by the De Camp Lumber Company against Shelley H. Tolhurst and wife and John A. McCarty to enforce a lien for materials furnished to defendant McCarty to be used in the construction of a house which McCarty was building for defendant Tolhurst. The Woodworth Commercial Company intervened for the purpose of enforcing its lien for materials furnished. There was a judgment in favor of the lien claimants, and defendants Tolhurst and wife appeal. Affirmed.

S. P. Mulford, for appellants. Chas. Casat Davis, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. In September, 1891, John A. McCarty entered into a written contract with Shelley H. Tolhurst, appellant, to furnish the materials and construct for him on a lot in the city of Los Angeles a dwelling house with fences and other structures, for the sum of $2,275. The contract was duly recorded, and by its terms 25 per cent. of the whole contract price was made payable 35 days after its final completion. The De Camp Lumber Company, respondent, under contract with McCarty, furnished materials which were used in the construction of the building, of the value of $1,023.54, of which sum $532.14 was still due and unpaid at the time of the commencement and trial of this action. The Woodworth Commercial Company, respondent, under contract with McCarty, also furnished materials which were used in the construction of the building, of the value of $69.48, no part of which sum had been paid. The building, fences, and other structures were completed on December 5, 1891, and on January 2, 1892, each of the respondent companies filed in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county its claim of lien for the materials furnished, in proper form, and duly verified. The De Camp Lumber Company commenced this action against the appellants and McCarty, the contractor, to foreclose its lien. The Woodworth Commercial Company intervened, and filed a complaint for the foreclosure of its lien. McCarty failed to appear, and allowed his default to be entered. The appellants answered both complaints, and denied all their material averments. The case was tried, and the court found upon all the issues in favor of the respondents; and, among other things, that 25 per cent. of the contract price—that is, $568.75—still remained in the hands of appellants, and that $75 was a reasonable attorney's fee to be allowed to each of the respondents. And as conclusions of law it found that each respondent was entitled to judgment against McCarty for the amount of its claim, with interest thereon from December 5, 1891, to the date of the judgment, and for costs of suit, including $75 for attorney's fee, the two claims aggregating, for principal and interest, $629.25; and also that respondents were entitled to a decree against appellants for the sale of the said house and lot, and the application of $568.75 of the proceeds thereof to the payment of the said judgments in proportion to their respective amounts, and for the application of so much of the balance of such proceeds as might be necessary to pay the said costs and attorney's fee. Judgments and decree were accordingly so entered, and the appeal is from that part of the decree directing the payment of the costs and attorney's fee out of the proceeds of the sale. The costs and attorney's fee amounted in the aggregate to $206.35, and whether or not the appellants could rightly be subjected to the payment of that sum, or any part thereof, is the only question presented for decision.

It is urged on behalf of the appellants that they were not personally liable for the debts of the contractor to any lienholder for materials or labor furnished, and that, if they had paid the demands of respondents before the final determination of the action, they would have done so at their peril, and would have imposed upon themselves the burden of proving that the demands paid were valid debts of the contractor, and secured by valid liens on their property; and that, failing to do this, they would have had no recourse against the contractor for indemnity; and hence it is insisted that the 25 per cent. of the contract price, $568.75, which still remained in their hands, was the extent and limit of their liability. Section 1193 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the contractor can recover on a lien filed by him only such amount as is due to him according to the terms of his contract; that he shall defend any action brought to enforce a lien for work done or materials furnished by a subcontractor at his own expense, and that during the pendency of such action the owner may withhold the amount of money for which the lien is filed; that in case of judgment against the owner or his property upon the lien the amount of such judgment and costs may be deducted by the owner from the amount due or to become due by him to the contractor, "and if the amount of such judgment and costs shall exceed the amount due by him to the contractor, or if the owner shall have settled with the contractor in full, he shall be entitled to recover back from the contractor any amount so paid by him, the said owner, in excess of the contract price, and for which the contractor was originally liable." And section 1195 of the same Code provides: "The court must also allow as part of the costs the money paid for filing and recording the lien, and reasonable attorneys' fees in the superior and supreme courts, such costs and attorneys' fees to be allowed to each lien claimant whose lien is established, whether he be plaintiff or defendant." These sections clearly recognize the rights of the successful lien claimant to recover his costs and a reasonable attorney's fee, and the only question is, can the payment of such costs and fee be enforced against the owner under circumstances such as are shown here? Section 1184, Code Civil Proc., requires that "at least twenty-five per cent. of the whole contract price shall be made payable at least thirty-five days after the final completion of the contract." This provision was evidently inserted for the protection of subcontractors, material men, and laborers, thus giving them, if unpaid, ample time after the work is completed to file their claims of lien and secure payment of any sums of money due them. After the completion of the contract the owner holds the reserved money for payment to the contractor or lien claimant, as the one or the other may prove to be entitled to it. If there be a contest between them in regard to the money, it is a matter for them to settle between themselves, and at their own expense, and with which the owner has no concern. In such a case the owner may and should deposit the money in court, and let the contestants then have their rights determined. In this case there was no contest between the contractor and respondents. By permitting his default to be entered, the contractor, in effect, admitted that respondents were entitled to the money. The appellants, however, retained the money, and apparently without cause or right raised a contest on every point, and fought the case through to the end. By so doing they delayed the respondents in recovering money to which they were justly entitled, and put them to unnecessary expense. Under such circumstances, we think the respondents' costs and attorney's fee were properly allowed and made payable out of the proceeds of the property ordered to be sold. The decree should therefore be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

SMITH v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (No. 19,153.)

COUNTY SUPERVISORS—CONTRACTS.

Act March 14, 1883, (County Government Act,) authorizes the county board of supervisors to issue bonds, and provides that the bonds shall be delivered to the county treasurer, by whom they shall be sold to the highest bidder. Section 25 further authorizes the board to do "all other acts and things * * * which may be necessary to the full discharge of the duties of the legislative authority of the county government." Held, that the board did not have authority, under section 25, to employ an agent to procure bids to be made for such bonds.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by Aaron Smith against the county of Los Angeles to recover for services performed under a contract with the county board. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Houghton, Silent & Campbell, for appellant. James McLachlan, B. M. Marble, and Waldo M. York, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The complaint in this action substantially alleges that the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county, after a favorable election had for that purpose, duly authorized the issuance of 300 bonds, in denominations of $1,000 each, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, for the erection of a county courthouse; that said bonds were duly executed and delivered to the county treasurer for sale, and that he, in pursuance of law, thereafter advertised for and invited bids for said bonds; that no bona fide bid had been made for any of the bonds, and that no sale thereof was or could be made until a bid for 110 of said bonds was procured and caused to be made by plaintiff, in pursuance of his employment by the board of supervisors to procure a bid to be made for said bonds, or a part thereof, by some bidder who would offer and bid therefor a price which said treasurer and said board were authorized by law to accept; that said bid so procured by the plaintiff for 110 of said bonds was accepted, and said bonds so bid for were by said treasurer sold at 5 per cent. premium and accrued interest, to said bidder so procured as aforesaid by plaintiff, and the purchase price thereof paid into the treasury of said county; that said board, acting for said county, agreed to pay plaintiff for such services what they were reasonably worth, and the value of the services so rendered was and is reasonably worth the sum of $3,300; that, within one year after he performed said services, plaintiff duly presented to said board his itemized claim, duly verified, for said services, which claim, and every part thereof, said board refused to allow, and wholly rejected the same. The complaint was demurred to, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained by the court, and, upon plaintiff refusing to amend, judgment was given for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

The question to be determined on this appeal involves the power of the board of supervisors to make the contract of employment upon which this action is founded. Section 25 of the act of March 14, 1883, commonly known as the "County Government Act," under which it is claimed such power was conferred, provides that "the board of supervisors in their respective counties have jurisdiction and power, under such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law," to create a bonded indebtedness, and to issue bonds of the county, as provided by section 37 of said act; and subdivision 14 of section 25 provides that, "whenever bonds issued under this chapter shall be duly executed, * * * they shall be delivered to the county treasurer, and his receipt taken therefor, and he shall stand charged on his official bond with all bonds delivered to him and the proceeds thereof, and he shall sell the same, or exchange them under the direction of the board of supervisors. * * * He shall also keep a record of bonds sold or exchanged by him, * * * and shall also report, under oath to the board, at each regular session, a statement of all bonds sold or exchanged by him since the preceding report, and the date of such sale or exchange, * * * and the amount of accrued interest received by him on such sale or exchange, * * * but such bonds shall not be sold or exchanged for any indebtedness of the county, except by the approval of the board of supervisors of said county. No sale shall be made of any such bond except to the highest bidder, after advertising bids for the purchase of the same" in the manner prescribed. And subdivision 35 of the same section empowers the board "to do and perform all other acts and things required by law not in this act enumerated, or which may be necessary to the full discharge of the duties of the legislative authority of the county government." Section 6 of the same act provides that "all contracts, authorizations, allowances, payments and liabilities to pay, made or attempted to be made in violation of this act, shall be absolutely void, and shall never be the foundation or basis of a claim against the treasury of such county. * * *" And section 36 thereof provides that "the board must not for any purpose contract debts or liabilities except in pursuance of law." It is clear that these provisions of the statute confer no express power upon the board of supervisors to make such a contract as the one sought to be recovered on in this action; and unless it can be implied from subdivision 35, referred to, then it follows that no such power exists, and the contract sued on is therefore void, because not made in pursuance of law. As the act of March 14, 1883, distinctly enumerates the acts which the board is required to perform with reference to the issuance and disposal of county bonds; and, as the employment of a procurer of bids for bonds delivered to the treasurer for sale or exchange under the law was not in any way necessary to the full discharge of the legislative authority of the county government, no such implied authority to make such a contract was conferred upon the board as contended for. The board of supervisors cannot sell or negotiate the sale of its county bonds. That power is expressly conferred by statute on the county treasurer, and is to be exercised by him under the direction of the board, and the sale or exchange of bonds by him is made subject to the approval of the board; in other words, the bid for the bonds is solicited and obtained upon the advertisement by the treasurer for such bid, and the law recognizes no other mode of procurement. The treasurer alone procures the bid, the mode and manner of such procurement being specifically pointed out by statute. The making of the contract in question by the board of supervisors was an unwarranted, if not a pragmatical, interference with the power and duties of the county treasurer, as expressly conferred and defined by law. It therefore follows that the employment of the plaintiff by the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county to procure a bid or bids for county bonds, delivered to the treasurer for sale or exchange, as alleged, was a void act; and the acts of plaintiff in pursuance of such employment, however beneficial they may have been to the defendant, created no liability against it. Let the judgment be affirmed.

SAN GABRIEL VALLEY LAND & WATER CO. v. DENNIS. (No. 19,148.)

CORPORATIONS—RECOVERY OF STOCK ASSESSMENTS.

1. In an action to recover an assessment on corporate stock, evidence that the assessment was made on the same day that defendant purchased the stock is sufficient to show that it was made while defendant was the owner of the stock, as it will not be presumed that the assessment was made a fraction of a day before the purchase.

2. A resolution by the board of directors "that the president and secretary are hereby ordered to commence suit for the collection of assessment" on stock sufficiently shows a waiver of further proceedings under the chapter for the collection of delinquent assessments.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. P. Wade, Judge.

Action by the San Gabriel Valley Land & Water Company against L. W. Dennis to collect an assessment on stock. There was a judgment in favor of defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. H. Judson and M. C. Hester, for appellant. Wells, Monroe & Lee, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to recover from respondent, who was a stockholder of the plaintiff corporation, the unpaid balance of an assessment upon 1,883 shares of its capital stock. The court below found that the respondent was not, at the time the assessment was levied, the owner of the stock, and that the board of directors had not, before the commencement of this action, elected to waive further statutory proceedings to collect the assessments. It was alleged in the complaint that the defendant was at all times mentioned therein the owner and holder of 1,883 shares of the capital stock of plaintiff, for which he had subscribed and agreed to pay. The answer simply denied that the defendant "ever was at any time owner or holder of 1,883 shares of the subscribed capital stock of said corporation." This denial in effect admitted that he was the owner and holder of 1,882 shares of the stock. But it is claimed by respondent that the plaintiff, having introduced evidence to prove that Dennis was a stockholder, treated the denial as sufficient, and cannot now be heard to question its sufficiency. But, in order to prove that the defendant was the owner of more than 1,882 shares, to wit, 1,883 shares, the plaintiff was compelled to offer the evidence which he introduced, and the authorities cited by respondent do not apply. But, however this may be, the evidence showed that the defendant was the owner of the stock. It showed that the assessment was made on the day the certificate of stock was issued. It is true it was not shown by the plaintiff that the purchase of the stock preceded the assessment, but no presumption can be indulged that the assessment was made a fraction of a day prior to the purchase by the defendant of the stock, especially in view of the fact that it was shown that the defendant had paid a portion of the assessment, and requested further time to pay the balance.

The court's second conclusion of law is equally untenable. It is based upon the alleged insufficiency of the resolution of the board to show a waiver of further proceedings under the chapter for the collection of delinquent assessments. It is found that all of the proceedings of the board with respect to the assessment were regular and valid, but it is claimed that no action can be maintained under section 349, Civil Code, unless the board in its resolution expressly declared its intention to waive further proceedings. The resolution referred to, and which was passed on the day fixed for the sale of the delinquent stock, reads as follows: "Resolved, that the president and secretary are hereby ordered to commence suit immediately to enforce the collection of assessment No. 5 on the following delinquent stock in the San Gabriel Valley Land & Water Company." Here follows a description of the stock and name of owner. This resolution, we think, is a sufficient indication of the intention of the corporation to waive further proceedings under the chapter for the collection of delinquent assessments, and to proceed only thereafter by action. The court erred in granting the nonsuit, and the motion for a new trial ought to have been granted. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

BEDAN v. TURNEY. (No. 19,159.)

APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—CRIMINAL CONVERSATION—WHEN ACTION LIES.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 950, providing that any statement used on motion for new trial, or any bill of exceptions settled, may be used on appeal from a final judgment, the fact that a bill of exceptions on appeal is entitled a bill of exceptions on motion for new trial is immaterial.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. § 650, providing that the judge in settling a bill of exceptions shall strike out all superfluous matter, it will be presumed that all matter relevant to rulings complained of has been inserted in the bill.

3. In order to sustain an action for criminal conversation it is not necessary that the intercourse should have been accomplished by force.

4. It is immaterial, in such an action, if the defendant had had criminal intercourse with plaintiff's wife, whether plaintiff was impotent, or whether the child borne by her was begotten by defendant or her husband.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by Martin Bedan against Elbert Turney for criminal conversation. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Louis Luckel, for appellant. Henry T. Gage, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action of crim. con. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed, assigning certain errors of the court in its instructions to the jury. The respondent makes a preliminary objection to the consideration of these errors upon the ground that the appeal is taken from the judgment alone, whereas the rulings are only found in a "bill of exceptions on motion for a new trial." Section 950, Code Civil Proc., however, provides that "on an appeal from a final judgment the appellant must furnish the court with a copy of the judgment roll, and of any bill of exceptions or statement in the case upon which the appellant relies. Any statement used on motion for a new trial, or any bill of exceptions settled, may be used on appeal from a final judgment equally as upon appeal from the order granting or refusing the new trial." The fact that the bill of exceptions in the present case is entitled a bill of exceptions on motion for a new trial, is immaterial.

It is also urged by the respondent that, inasmuch as the bill of exceptions does not purport to contain all the evidence before the court below, the instructions given by the court cannot be regarded as prejudicial, unless they were erroneous in every conceivable view, and that for the purpose of sustaining the judgment in the present case it may be assumed that there was evidence to the effect that plaintiff connived at the criminal conversation of the defendant with his wife. The purpose of a bill of exceptions is to preserve a record of the rulings or decisions of the court, and by section 650, Code Civil Proc., the party desiring to have his exceptions settled is to prepare a draft of a bill, which shall contain all the exceptions upon which he relies, and to this draft the opposite party may propose amendments. The bill does not become effective until it is settled by the judge, and by the same section he is directed "to strike out of it all redundant and useless matter, so that the exceptions may be presented as briefly as possible." If in such proposed draft there is inserted a ruling of the court deemed by the party preparing the same to be erroneous, it is the duty of the opposite party to present in his amendments any matters which would obviate the apparent error; and it must be assumed that the judge, in settling the bill, has caused to be inserted therein all matter which is relevant to his ruling, or will explain the same. Hyde v. Boyle, 89 Cal. 590, 26 Pac. Rep. 1092. This bill of exceptions forms a part of the judgment roll and of the court's record of its own acts, and for the purpose of determining whether this record contains any error only the record itself can be examined. When an appeal from a judgment is heard upon the judgment roll alone, nothing can be assumed or considered that does not appear upon the face of that roll. If that discloses error, we can no more assume that it was cured by some matter which does not appear therein than we can consider matters outside of the roll for the purpose of impeaching the correctness of the judgment. In each case the record must be judged by itself alone.

The plaintiff requested the court to give to the jury the following instruction: "The jury are instructed that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant debauched Franzisca Bedan, the wife of plaintiff, and had carnal intercourse with her without the consent of the plaintiff, then they are to determine the amount of damages done the plaintiff, not exceeding the sum asked for." The court refused to give this instruction, but at the request of the defendant instructed the jury as follows: "The court instructs you that, in order for plaintiff to recover in this case, it is necessary for plaintiff to establish by a preponderance of evidence that the defendant had intercourse with the witness Franzisca Bedan by means of violence, or against her will, or without her consent. The mere fact of intercourse with her would not be sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover; and there is no evidence in this case, as far as the use of artifice or persuasion or anything of that kind is concerned, in the way of seduction. And that the degree of violence necessary to entitle plaintiff to recover is such as would overcome her resistance." The court appears to have proceeded upon the theory that in an action of this character the plaintiff cannot recover, unless it is shown that the sexual intercourse between the defendant and the wife was accomplished by means of force. In this the court was in error. The foundation of the husband's right of action is the wrong done him by the defendant in violating his personal rights. The husband has the right to the conjugal fellowship of his wife, to her society, her aid, and her fidelity in every conjugal relation. Any act of another by which he is deprived of this right constitutes a personal wrong, for which the law gives him a redress in damages. Her sexual intercourse with another is an invasion of his rights, and it is immaterial whether this invasion is accomplished by force or by the consent of the wife. As the right belongs to the husband, it is no defense to his action for redress that its violation was by the consent or procurement of the wife, for she is not competent to give such consent; and it is not necessary that the husband should show that it was by force or against her will. The original form of this action was trespass vi et armis, (3 Bl. Comm. 139,) even though the act was with the consent of the wife, for the reason, as was said by Holt, C. J., in Rigaut v. Gallisard, 7 Mod. 78, that "the law will not allow her a consent in such case to the prejudice of her husband, because of the interest he has in her;" but under this form of action it was not necessary to make any proof of force, as that was implied by the law. 1 Chit. Pl. 140. Although seduction is ordinarily the means by which the adulterous intercourse is brought about, yet the action may be maintained without making proof of the seduction. The wrong to the husband consists in the carnal intercourse with his wife by another, and it is immaterial whether this intercourse is accomplished by persuasion or by force. Egbert v. Greenwalt, 44 Mich. 245, 6 N. W. Rep. 654. His right of action is established upon proof of the intercourse, and the means by which this intercourse was effected are but incidents to increase or mitigate his damages. The rule is well formulated by Bishop in his treatise on Marriage, Divorce and Separation, (volume 1, § 1366,) viz.: "One's sexual intercourse with another's wife is a civil wrong to the husband, except where some special circumstance renders it otherwise; and it is more or less aggravated, bringing with it heavier or lighter penalties, according as it is attended by seduction or rape, or other enormity on the one hand, or by the wife's unsolicited willingness or other mitigating fact on the other." "The essential injury to the husband consists in the defilement of the marriage bed,—in the invasion of his exclusive right to marital intercourse with his wife, and to beget his own children. This presumes the loss of the consortium with his wife, of comfort in her society in that respect in which his right is peculiar and exclusive." Bigaouette v. Paulet, 134 Mass. 123. The respondent seeks to uphold these rulings of the court upon the ground that there was no evidence before the jury except such as tended to show that the sexual intercourse between the defendant and the plaintiff's wife was effected by force on the part of the defendant, and was without her consent. It is not necessary here to reproduce the testimony upon this point. It is sufficient to say that, even upon this theory, the jury should have been permitted to determine from the evidence whether the facts sustained the theory. The evidence was not of such a character as would sustain a charge of rape, and the jury should have been allowed to find whether her objections to the intercourse were real or pretended,—whether she manifested a virtuous indignation at the proposal of the defendant, or merely showed a coy resistance, which induced him to continue his advances; for, as was said by Lord Holt in Rigaut v. Gallisard, supra: "If a man solicit a woman, and go gently to work with her at first, and when he finds that will not do he proceeds to force, it is all one continued act, beginning with insinuation and ending with force." For this purpose the language in which she described his solicitation and her yielding, the place and manner in which it was accomplished, their relative strength and appearance, her silence to her husband for many months thereafter, and her subsequent interviews with the defendant, were matters to be passed upon by a jury, and should not have been assumed by the court as facts established in the case.

The court also instructed the jury at the request of the defendant as follows: "You are instructed that if you find from the evidence that Martin Bedan, the plaintiff, was not impotent at the time the child born of Franzisca Bedan, about September 14, 1891, was begotten, and if you further find that the defendant, Elbert Turney did not on or about December 15, 1890, by force and violence, or against her will, have carnal intercourse with Franzisca Bedan, wife of plaintiff, you will then find for the defendant." The plaintiff's right of action did not depend upon his impotence or capacity, and if the defendant had had carnal intercourse with the wife, either with or without her consent, it was immaterial for the purposes of this action whether there had been any matrimonial intercourse between the plaintiff and his wife, or whether the child that was born from her was begotten by him or by the defendant. The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

BANK OF SAN LUIS OBISPO v. WICKERSHAM et al. (No. 19,181.)

EQUITY — RESCISSION OF CONTRACTS — CORPORATIONS—STOCK—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—PLEADING.

1. In an action by a corporation against a former stockholder to recover money paid him by its president for his stock on an ultra vires purchase thereof for plaintiff, the complaint does not state a cause of action if it fails to show that plaintiff has returned or offered to return the stock.

2. Plaintiff is not excused from such tender on the ground that its purchase of its own stock extinguished it, since the stock was not actually extinguished, the only effect of the purchase being to lessen the amount of subscribed capital stock, leaving plaintiff free to issue the same number of shares to new subscribers, and therefore it could have issued a new certificate to defendant.

3. Conceding that a demurrer on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because it appears on the face thereof that the action is barred by the statute of limitations, is a sufficient plea of the statute, yet, where the demurrer specifies a particular section of the statute as relied upon, that section only is pleaded.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action by the Bank of San Luis Obispo against one Wickersham and others. From a judgment for defendants on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James L. Crittenden and Graves & Graves, for appellant. Wilcoxon & Bouldin and Lippitt & Lippitt, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. The plaintiff is a banking corporation, and in its complaint alleges that on September 10, 1876, it was financially embarrassed, and unable to meet its liabilities without borrowing large sums of money, and that the defendant Wickersham was then the owner of 400 shares of its stock, each share being of the par value of $100, but the actual value of which did not exceed $75 per share, and that the plaintiff was then offering the unsold shares of its capital stock for $80 per share, but was unable to find subscribers therefor. It is further alleged that the defendant Wickersham and his codefendants entered into a conspiracy to transfer to the defendant Wickersham $40,000 of the money and assets of plaintiff, through and by means of a sale of said 400 shares of its own stock then owned by him; and that, for the purpose of concealing from plaintiff the fact that he was the real vendor of the stock, it was further agreed between defendants that the sale should appear to be made by the defendants Steele and Harford, as the owners of such stock; and that, in pursuance of such conspiracy, the defendant Phillips, then president of plaintiff, and acting in its behalf, purchased said stock from defendants Steele and Harford for the sum of $40,000, and on September 10, 1876, paid such agreed price therefor out of the moneys belonging to plaintiff, and caused the transaction to be entered in the books of plaintiff as a purchase of said stock by plaintiff from defendants Steele and Harford. It is also alleged that Steele and Harford paid over to Wickersham the money thus received by them. It is also averred in the complaint that defendant Wickersham induced and coerced the defendant Phillips to enter into the agreement for the purchase of said 400 shares of stock by threatening to institute proceedings against him charging him with the embezzlement of moneys belonging to plaintiff while he was such president. The complaint then proceeds to state that Phillips ceased to be president of the plaintiff corporation on October 10, 1876, one month after the transaction complained of in this action; and that he kept in his private custody certain letters written to him by defendant Wickersham in relation to the sale of said stock until on or about March 15, 1891, when he delivered the same to J. L. Crittenden, president of plaintiff, upon being requested by the latter to search for and ascertain whether he still had any letters in his possession written to him while he was president, and in relation to the business of plaintiff, and said Phillips at the same time disclosed to said Crittenden the facts in relation to Wickersham's connection with the sale of said stock, and the threats made by said Wickersham which induced him to agree to the purchase; and in this connection the complaint further states that the facts constituting the fraud in the sale of such stock as set forth in the complaint "were then and thereby first ascertained and discovered by said corporation and its stockholders." It is not stated in the complaint that either of the defendants was a director of plaintiff at the time of the purchase and sale of the stock referred to, with the exception of the defendant Phillips, who is inferentially alleged to have been one of its then directors, and there is no averment that plaintiff has ever offered to return the stock received by it as the result of the purchase complained of. The prayer of the complaint is for a judgment against Wickersham for the amount paid to him upon the sale of the stock, and that he account to plaintiff for all profits made by him from the use of such money, and for such other relief against him and the other defendants as shall be deemed proper. Wickersham and Steele were the only defendants who seem to have appeared in the superior court, and they demurred to the complaint, upon the grounds—First, that the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and, second, that the alleged cause of action is barred by sections 337, 343, and subdivision 1, § 339, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The demurrer was sustained, and judgment thereupon rendered in favor of defendants Wickersham and Steele. The plaintiff appeals.

The action is one for relief upon the ground of fraud, and the law prescribing the limitation for such an action is found in subdivision 4, § 338, of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that actions for relief upon the ground of fraud or mistake shall be brought within three years, "the cause of action in such cases not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake." The demurrer does not present the question whether the cause of action attempted to be stated in the complaint is or is not barred by this provision of the statute of limitations, and we are therefore not called upon to determine whether the complaint shows plaintiff's discovery of the facts constituting the fraud complained of within three years of the commencement of the action, within the meaning of the law. That question has been elaborately argued by counsel, but it is clear to us that it is not raised by the demurrer. It was held in Brennan v. Ford, 46 Cal. 7, that it is a sufficient plea of the statute of limitations, by way of demurrer, to say that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because "it appears therefrom that the cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations;" but, assuming this to be the correct rule when applied to a demurrer upon this ground, we think it must be held that when, as in the present case, a demurrer does specify the particular sections upon which the defendant relies to defeat the action, no other sections of the statute are pleaded, and the only question for decision is whether the cause of action is barred by the particular section or sections mentioned in the demurrer, and thus interposed as a bar. It is only necessary to add upon this point that the plaintiff's cause of action is not barred by either of the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure referred to in the demurrer, as the cause of action attempted to be stated in the complaint is not embraced in either of the classes of actions mentioned in those sections.

The demurrer was, however, properly sustained upon the other ground stated therein. The complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The plaintiff is not entitled to any relief because of the alleged fraud practiced upon it in the sale of the stock without a complete rescission of the contract of sale; and to effect this it was incumbent upon plaintiff to act with reasonable diligence, and return, or offer to return, to defendants the stock received from them under the contract. It cannot be permitted to retain the shares of stock thus received by it, and at the same time recover from defendants the money paid to them as the purchase price of such stock. This would be contrary to justice, and can receive no countenance in a court of equity. There is no averment in the complaint of any offer on the part of plaintiff to return the stock purchased, and plaintiff apparently rested satisfied with the contract for more than 15 years. Counsel for plaintiff do not dispute the general proposition that, to entitle one to rescind a contract, he must restore to the other party everything of value received from him under such contract; but it is claimed by them that the stock was extinguished by the sale, and therefore cannot be legally returned, and that all defendant Wickersham can justly claim is to receive in the statement of the account demanded in the complaint a credit for the value of such stock at the time of the sale. We do not agree with counsel upon this point. The shares of stock were not extinguished by the sale in such sense that they could not be reissued by plaintiff to any one subsequently subscribing for shares of its capital stock. Plaintiff's purchase did not reduce the number of shares which plaintiff was authorized to issue by its articles of incorporation. The only effect of the transaction was to reduce the amount of the subscribed capital stock, leaving the plaintiff free to again issue the same number of shares to any one desiring to subscribe for its capital stock. Cook, Stock & S. §§ 282, 314; 1 Mor. Priv. Corp. § 114; State v. Smith, 48 Vt. 266; Williams v. Manufacturing Co., 3 Md. Ch. 451; Railway Frog Co. v. Haven, 101 Mass. 398. The contract of sale was ultra vires, and resulted in an illegal withdrawal of plaintiff's capital actually paid in, but the stock was not actually extinguished, and so long as there remained that number of shares of its capital stock unsold by it the plaintiff could at any time have issued a new certificate therefor, and tendered the same to defendants, which would in legal effect have been a tender of the same shares sold by them to plaintiff. It follows from these views that the judgment must be affirmed.

NEW ZEALAND INS. CO. v. BRADBEER.
(No. 19,192.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence, though conflicting, is quite sufficient to support the findings of the lower court, the judgment based on such findings will not be reversed on appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by the New Zealand Insurance Company against George Bradbeer. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ben Goodrich, for appellant. John D. Pope and Lacy & Trask, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff, a foreign corporation, was engaged in the insurance business in this state from July, 1887, to and including January, 1891. Its principal place of business was in the city of San Francisco, but it had a branch office in the city of Los Angeles. From January, 1888, to January 10, 1891, defendant was the agent of plaintiff, and the manager of its business at its Los Angeles office, and as such was charged with the receipt and disbursement of its funds at that office. In August, 1891, plaintiff brought this action to recover from defendant the sum of $1,600, alleged to have been collected by him as such agent and manager from various persons to and for the use of plaintiff, and not paid over or accounted for, though demand for its payment had been made. The answer of defendant was a general denial. The case was tried without a jury, and the court found, in effect, that the defendant had received for and on account of the plaintiff sums of money which he had not paid over nor accounted for, aggregating, with the interest thereon, $798.95. The court accordingly gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum named, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The principal contention on the part of the appellant is that the findings were not justified by the evidence. The evidence brought up in the transcript covers more than 220 printed pages, and it would subserve no useful purpose to attempt to set it out or state its substance. A careful inspection of the record, however, shows that, while the evidence is conflicting in many respects, it is still quite sufficient to uphold and justify the findings. The judgment, therefore, cannot be reversed on this ground.

The only other ground urged for a reversal is that the findings do not cover all the issues raised in the case. This point cannot be sustained. The findings are full and explicit as to all the items for which judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff; and, as to the others, no special findings were necessary, for the reason that as to them the judgment was in effect in favor of the defendant. It results that the judgment and order appealed from must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. DOUGLASS. (No. 20,983.)

CRIMINAL LAW—DISMISSAL OF PROSECUTION—UNREASONABLE DELAY—INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Pen. Code, § 1382, provides that a prosecution must, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, be dismissed if a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within 60 days after the finding of the indictment of filing of the information. Held, that a refusal to discharge defendant under such section would not be reversed on appeal, when it did not appear from the bill of exceptions that a previous postponement of the trial was not assented to by defendant, nor that there was no good cause shown for such refusal.

2. The fact that on the refusal to give an instruction on the ground that the substance thereof had already been given the instruction was simply marked "Refused," without stating the ground of the refusal, is not an error of which advantage can be taken on appeal.

3. An instruction that "where there are two presumptions, one in favor of innocence, and the other in favor of a criminal course," the former must prevail, is properly refused, as there can be but the one presumption of innocence in a criminal case.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Steve Douglass was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. T. Matlock and A. B. Coffman, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny, charged to have been committed April 9, 1892, in Tehama county, by feloniously stealing, taking, and carrying away one cow, the property of H. C. Wilson. The information was filed April 29, 1892, and on May 4th the defendant was arraigned and pleaded not guilty to the charge. On May 9th, by order of court, the trial of the case was set for June 8th. On the last-named day, on motion of the district attorney, the trial was postponed to a day to be thereafter set. On July 2d counsel for defendant moved the court that he be discharged, on the ground that he had not been tried within 60 days after the filing of the information. The motion was denied, and an exception reserved. On August 27th the case was again set for trial on September 21st. At the time so set the trial was commenced, and on the next day concluded with a verdict of "guilty of grand larceny as charged in the information." In due time the defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and thereupon judgment was pronounced that he be punished by imprisonment in the state prison for the term of three years. From this judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial the defendant appeals.

1. Appellant contends that the judgment should be reversed, because under the provisions of section 1382 of the Penal Code, as construed in People v. Morino, 85 Cal. 515, 24 Pac. Rep. 892, he was on July 2d entitled to be discharged from further prosecution, and the court had no discretion or right to deny his motion of that date for a discharge. This position is rested upon the theory that the court had no authority on June 8th to postpone the trial without the consent of the defendant, unless upon affidavit showing good cause therefor, and that no such consent was given or showing made. The section of the Code referred to is as follows: "The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed in the following cases: * * * (2) If a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment, or filing of the information." The bill of exceptions is entirely silent as to the orders postponing the trial and refusing to dismiss the prosecution, and there is nothing in the transcript in regard to those orders, except the record entries made by the clerk of the court below. These entries are as follows: June 8, 1892. Court met. Title of case. Defendant and his counsel and the district attorney came into court. "The district attorney now states to the court that a material witness for the prosecution is sick, and unable to attend; and the defendant refusing to permit the deposition of said witness taken before the committing magistrate to be read in evidence, on the motion of the district attorney it is ordered that this cause be continued to be hereafter set." July 2, 1892. Court met. Title of case. "Defendant's counsel now moves the court that the defendant herein be discharged, on the ground that the said defendant has not been tried within sixty days after the filing of the information, which motion was denied by the court, and excepted to by the defendant." It will be observed that it does not appear from the first entry that the defendant objected to the continuance, or that it was not granted with his full and free consent. And the rule is that, in the absence of any showing as to what took place when the order was made, the appellate court will presume in support of the action of the court below that the defendant assented to the order. People v. Swafford, 65 Cal. 223, 3 Pac. Rep. 809. It will also be observed that it does not appear from the second entry that good cause for denying the motion was not shown. Conceding, then, as held in People v. Morino, supra, that the burden was upon the prosecution to show good cause for holding the defendant without trial for a longer time than that named in the statute, and that in the absence of such showing the court had no discretion in the matter, but was imperatively required to grant the defendant's trial, still the rule is settled by decisions of this court, found in nearly every volume of our reports, that on appeal all intendment are in favor of the regularity of the action of the court below, and that error will never be presumed, but must affirmatively appear. Under this rule it was incumbent upon the defendant, if he claimed error, to set out in his bill of exceptions the facts showing it. As he wholly failed to do this, his first contention cannot be sustained.

2. At the preliminary examination of defendant one H. F. Wilson was examined as a witness, and his testimony was taken down by a shorthand reporter, and thereafter written out in longhand, and certified and filed by the reporter, as required by section 869 of the Penal Code. At the trial it was admitted that the said H. F. Wilson was dead, and thereupon the district attorney offered to read in evidence his testimony taken before the committing magistrate. The defendant objected to the testimony being read, "upon the ground that due diligence has not been shown to bring this witness before the court to obtain his evidence in the regular way." The objection was overruled, and this ruling is complained of as erroneous. The testimony was clearly admissible and the ruling proper. Pen. Code, § 686; People v. Gannon, 61 Cal. 476; People v. Oiler, 66 Cal. 101, 4 Pac Rep. 1066. Several other objections were made to the admission of evidence, but we see no material error in any of the rulings. If there was error, it was trivial, and those rulings may therefore be passed without special notice.

3. The next point is that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury two instructions asked by defendant. The instructions refused are in these words: "The prosecution must establish the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt, independent of any hypothesis produced on the part of the defendant." "A presumption is a deduction or conclusion which the law expressly directs to be made from particular facts; and where there are two presumptions, one in favor of innocence and the other in favor of a criminal course, the one in favor of innocence must prevail." The law declared in the first instruction referred to was clearly and fully stated in other instructions given at the request of defendant, and it was not error, as has been many times held by this court, to refuse to give an instruction which had been already given in substance. The court is not bound to repeat itself. The instruction was simply indorsed "Refused," with the name of the judge, and it is further claimed that if the refusal was because the instruction had already been given in substance, the ground of the refusal should have been stated. It is true that such a rule was declared in some of the early cases decided by this court, but, if a failure to comply with it was error, it was an immaterial one, which could not prejudice the defendant, and for which the judgment cannot be reversed. People v. Ramirez, 56 Cal. 538. There was no error in the refusal to give the second instruction referred to. There cannot be two presumptions in a criminal case. The accused is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established beyond any reasonable doubt, and the court, in effect, so charged the jury.

4. Finally, the point is made that, if the defendant was guilty at all, he was guilty of embezzlement, and not of larceny, and hence that the judgment should be reversed. This point cannot be sustained. There was evidence sufficient to justify the verdict, and it cannot be disturbed here on the ground named. It follows that the judgment and order must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment, and generally in the foregoing opinion. I wish to add, however, that even if it appeared that the court erred in not granting defendant's motion for a dismissal of the prosecution because of the failure to place him on trial within the time specified in section 1382 of the Penal Code, still that would not be sufficient ground for a reversal of the judgment. A judgment should not be reversed for such an error, except in a case where, if the motion had been granted, the statute of limitations would have been a bar to a new information or indictment for the same offense. In other cases the remedy for a defendant whose motion for a dismissal has been improperly denied is an application for a writ of habeas corpus before judgment of conviction.

PEOPLE et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF
SAN FRANCISCO et al. (No. 15,469.)

BANKS AND BANKING—PROCEEDINGS IN INSOLVENCY—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—SPECIAL LEGISLATION—TITLE OF ACT—VALIDITY.

1. Bank Commissioners' Act March 30, 1878, provides for the examination of all banks by commissioners appointed therefor. Section 11 of such act, as amended by St. 1887, p. 90, provides that if the bank commissioners find that any such corporation has violated its charter, or is conducting business in an unsafe manner, and refuses to discontinue its illegal practices, the attorney general may bring suit in the proper court to prohibit the transaction of further business, and to wind up its affairs. Section 21 provides that all acts are repealed in so far as they are inconsistent with this act. Insolvent Act 1880, § 8, provides that an adjudication of insolvency may be made for causes enumerated therein on the petition of five or more creditors whose demands amount in the aggregate to not less than $500; and section 25 requires the assignee, "as speedily as possible, to convert the estate, real and personal, into money." Held, that the insolvent act is superseded by the bank commissioners' act as far as banking corporations are concerned, and that an adjudication of insolvency against a banking corporation, and the appointment of a receiver therefor, would not lie on the petition of creditors therefor.

2. A contention that the sole object of the bank commissioners' act is visitation and a report to the attorney general by the commissioners, and that there is no suggestion therein for the sequestration of assets, is untenable; section 11 of such act further providing that if the court shall consider it unsafe for the corporation to continue to transact business, and that it is insolvent, an injunction shall be issued, and thereupon such proceedings shall be taken against the corporation "as may be decided upon by its creditors," and sections 18 and 19 authorizing the commissioners to maintain actions in the name of the people, under the court's direction.

3. A further contention, that there is nothing compulsory about the attorney general's duty to institute such proceedings, because section 11 provides that the institution of such proceedings shall be "in his discretion," and that, if he should fail to do so, the creditors would have no remedy, cannot be considered, since it will not be presumed that sworn officers will fail in duty.

4. The remedies provided by the two acts are not cumulative, nor the powers conferred by the bank commissioners' act auxiliary to those conferred by the insolvent act, the object of the bank commissioners' act being to provide an entirely different scheme for winding up the business of a banking corporation.

5. The bank commissioners' act is not a contravention of Const. art. 4, § 25, providing that the legislature shall not pass local or special laws granting to any corporation any special or exclusive right, privilege, or immunity.

6. The title of such act, "The Bank Commissioners' Act," sufficiently expresses the subject of the act, and is sufficiently general in its scope, within Const. art. 4, § 24, it being unnecessary that the title should embrace an abstract of its contents.

In bank.

Petition by the people and others for a writ of prohibition directing the superior court of San Francisco and the creditors of the Pacific Bank to cease from prosecuting proceedings to have such bank declared insolvent and placed in the hands of a receiver. Writ granted.

Atty. Gen. Hart and Forbes & Barnard, (A. R. Cotton, of counsel,) for petitioners. Dunne & McPike and Dorn & Dorn, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. The Pacific Bank suspended payment and closed its doors on June 23, 1893. On the 11th of August following, seven of its creditors, representing an indebtedness of $3,063.29, filed a petition in involuntary insolvency, asking for an order to show cause why it should not be adjudged an insolvent. The grounds of the petition were that the bank, being insolvent, had suffered its property to remain under attachment for more than four days; that in contemplation of insolvency it had conveyed to the People's Home Savings Bank certain real property; that it was concealing and removing a portion of its property, and that it had failed for over 40 days to pay money deposited by depositors. Thereupon an order was made directing the corporation to show cause on the 24th day of August, 1893, why it should not be adjudged an insolvent debtor, and directed to surrender its estate for the benefit of its creditors in the manner required of insolvent debtors. On August 15th the vice president of the bank filed an answer, denying that the transfer of the bank property to the People's Home Savings Bank was without consideration, or to give a preference, or to hinder or delay or prejudice creditors, and denying that it was removing or concealing any of its property; but the insolvency of the bank was admitted. The answer alleged the willingness of the corporation to surrender its property for the benefit of its creditors, and to comply with all the provisions of the insolvent act. On the day this answer was filed an order was made by the court below adjudging the corporation to be an insolvent debtor, directing schedules to be filed, and appointing Mr. McDade, who is sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, a receiver to take charge of the property and collect debts until the appointment of an assignee. November 15, 1893, was fixed as the day upon which the creditors should appear to prove their debts and elect an assignee. The usual orders were made, at the same time, granting a stay of all proceedings against the insolvent, etc. On August 30, 1893, the board of directors of the bank held a meeting, and by resolution ratified the act of its vice president in filing the answer, and on August 31st the court made and filed another order, substantially the same as the order of August 15th. A motion was made in the court below by the petitioners herein to set aside the orders, on the ground that the court had exceeded its jurisdiction in making the same. This motion having been denied, an application was made here for a writ of prohibition. An alternative writ was issued, a hearing has been had thereon, and the matter submitted for decision.

The attorney general claimed at the argument that the Pacific Bank is a savings bank, and as such is expressly excepted from the provisions of the insolvent act of 1880 by section 8¹ thereof; that the provisions of the insolvent act which relate to involuntary proceedings do not include corporations; that, conceding these points to be not well taken, the order of adjudication was void, because premature,—made before the return day fixed by the order; that the vice president of the bank could not consent to the adjudication, nor could the directors authorize him to do so, or ratify his act after he had done so. But, in view of our conclusion upon another question, it is unnecessary to determine any of these contentions. The act commonly known as the "Bank Commissioners' Act," approved March 30, 1878, provides for the appointment by the governor of three persons, one of whom shall be "an expert of accounts," to act as bank commissioners. It is made the duty of these commissioners to visit and examine all banks and report their proceedings to the governor; and also to ascertain the condition of such corporations, whether any of them is insolvent or unable to fulfill its obligations, and, if so, to report its condition to the attorney general as soon as may be. Penalties are imposed on the commissioners for failure to perform their duties, and upon officers of the bank for failure to make reports as required by the provisions of the act. St. 1877-78, p. 740. Section 11 of this act, as amended in 1887, (St. 1887, p. 90,) reads as follows: "Sec. 11. If such commissioners, on examination of the affairs of any corporation mentioned in this act, shall find that any such corporation has been guilty of violating its charter or law, or the provisions of this act, or is conducting business in an unsafe manner, they shall, by an order adressed to the corporation so offending, direct discontinuance of such illegal and unsafe practices, and a conformity with the requirements of its charter and of law under this act; and if such corporation shall refuse or neglect to comply with such order, or whenever it shall appear to said commissioners that it is unsafe for such corporation as in this act mentioned to continue to transact business, they shall notify the attorney general of such fact, who, after examination, in his discretion may commence suit in the proper court against such corporation to enjoin and prohibit the transaction of any further business by such corporation; and, upon the hearing of the case, if the judge of the court where the case is tried shall be of the opinion that it is unsafe for the parties interested, or for such corporation, to continue to transact business, and that such corporation or institution is insolvent, he shall issue the injunction applied for by said commissioners and attorney general, who shall cause said injunction to be served according to law; and said judge shall further direct said commissioners to take such proceedings against such corporation as may be decided upon by its creditors. If any corporation mentioned in this act which is now insolvent, or which may hereafter become insolvent, or be thrown into liquidation by process of law, or by the order or consent of its stockholders, directors, managing officers, managers or creditors, the affairs of such corporation shall be closed, and the business thereof settled within four years from the time it shall be declared to be insolvent or be thrown into liquidation, as the case may be, unless at the expiration of such time it shall obtain the consent in writing from a majority of the board of bank commissioners to continue in liquidation for a longer period. The bank commissioners shall, however, have no power to grant a continuance for such purpose for a longer period than one year at each time. Any corporation mentioned herein now in liquidation, or that may be hereafter thrown into liquidation, shall make semiannual reports of the condition of its affairs to the bank commissioners in the same manner as the solvent banks mentioned in this act, and in addition thereto shall state the amount of dividends paid, debts collected, and the amount realized on property sold if any since the previous report. The bank commissioners shall have the power, and it is hereby made their duty, to examine the condition of every such corporation in liquidation in the same manner as in the case of solvent banks, and shall have a general supervisory control of any such corporation. They shall have the power to designate the number of officers and employees necessary to close up the business of any such corporation, and fix the salaries of the same; and shall do all in their power to make such liquidation as economical and expeditious as the interests of the depositors and stockholders will admit. The bank commissioners are hereby empowered to examine into the affairs of all banks in process of liquidation at the time of the passage of this act. When any such bank shall have been for two years next preceding the passage of this act in process of liquidation, or when any such bank shall have been in liquidation for two years from the time it was declared insolvent, or thrown into liquidation, the bank commissioners shall have the power to direct that the business of the bank shall be closed, and may designate a time when such closing shall be effected, and may limit the number of officers and employees, fix their salaries, and make such other orders as are necessary for the economical and expeditious administration of the affairs of the bank. If any officer or employee of any insolvent corporation mentioned in this act shall refuse to comply with the provisions of this section, or disregard or refuse to obey the directions of said bank commissioners given in accordance with the provisions of this act, such officer or employee shall be punished by a fine of not less than five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail for not less than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, as a court of competent jurisdiction may determine."

We have no doubt that this section was intended by the legislature to provide for every case involving the winding up of the business of a banking corporation, and that it necessarily supersedes the provisions of the insolvent act of 1880, so far as this class of corporations is concerned. It is entirely clear that, if substantial effect is to be given to the provisions of this section, the Pacific Bank cannot be put through insolvency under the provisions of the insolvent act. The two acts are utterly repugnant in letter and in spirit. The bank commissioners' act attempts to provide a scheme for the visitation and examination of all banks, and the winding up of the affairs of such as are found to be insolvent, provided it appears that it is unsafe for the corporation to continue to transact business. The act is not as perfect in detail as it might be,—a complaint which has been made in other states with respect to similar statutes,—but it cannot for this reason be held invalid. It is provided (section 21) that all acts are "repealed in so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this act." The enforcement of the insolvent act would defeat the plain purposes contemplated by the bank commissioners' act. The question is not so much whether the scheme provided is complete in all matters of detail, but whether the legislature intended to exempt banking corporations from the operation of the insolvent act; and this intention we think is clearly manifested, though not expressly stated. It is provided that if the commissioners find that the corporation has been guilty of violating its charter or law, or is conducting business in an unsafe manner, and the corporation refuses to discontinue its illegal practices, the attorney general may commence suit in the proper court to prohibit the transaction of any further business, and wind up its affairs. The statute is essentially one of bankruptcy in relation to this class of corporations. Town v. Bank, 2 Doug. (Mich.) 556.

Proceedings under the insolvent act are of a summary nature. The assignee is required "as speedily as possible to convert the estate, real and personal, into money." If that were done in the case of the Pacific Bank, it would result in the sacrifice of the assets, a thing that will not occur under section 11 of the bank commissioners' act, which provides ample time for the closing of the affairs of the bank. The law is intended to secure economy in the liquidation of the affairs of a stranded bank. The bank commissioners receive no fee. Their compensation is paid by the state. They designate the number of officers and employees, and fix their salaries, and they are bound by the terms of the act to do all in their power to make the liquidation economical, and as expeditious as the interests of the depositors and stockholders will admit. Under section 28 of the insolvent act assignees are allowed "all necessary expenses in the care, management and settlement of the estate, and shall collectively be entitled to charge and receive for their services commissions upon all sums of money coming to their hands and accounted for by them, as follows: For the first thousand dollars, at the rate of seven per cent.; for all above that sum and not exceeding ten thousand dollars, at the rate of five per cent.; and for all above that sum, at the rate of four per cent." Of course, the fact that large commissions are allowed, and great expenses would be incurred, under the insolvent act, is no reason why the act should not be enforced, but it is a matter for consideration in determining the intent with which the legislature passed the bank commissioners' act. If five creditors, representing five hundred dollars, can throw a banking corporation into insolvency, and enforce a winding up of its affairs, stockholders and creditors generally will receive very little benefit from the provisions of section 11 of the bank commissioners' act. There are very few banking institutions which have passed through periods of financial distress without being in a condition of insolvency,—when enough could not have been realized from their assets in a speedy way to discharge their liabilities. "At such times assets shrink and shrivel in value, but liabilities remain unchanged. They never diminish. Now, it is easy to see, if the court should put forth its power at such a time merely because the corporation assailed had from such causes become insolvent, it would do harm, rather than good, and that, instead of giving protection to creditors, it would imperil their safety, and instead of preserving the rights of stockholders it would destroy the value of their stock. * * * Mere insolvency is not enough to induce the court to act; but to induce it to act such a state of insolvency must be shown as satisfies it that the corporation will not be able in a short time to resume its business with safety to the public and advantage to the stockholders. Such I understand to have been the view entertained by Governor Pennington. In Brundred v. Machine Co., supra, [4 N. J. Eq. 294,] he said: 'It would be unwise and against public policy to seek an occasion for interference with any corporation, so long as they are striving against adversity, with an honest purpose, unless their case is hopeless, or their course of action so unfair as to jeopardize the interest of creditors and the public.'" Atlantic Trust Co. v. Consolidated Electric Storage Co., 49 N. J. Eq. 406, 23 Atl. Rep. 934. These were the considerations which actuated the legislature in passing this act. It was seen that if the door were left open to a few creditors to bring suit and wind up the affairs of a banking corporation under the summary and expensive proceedings provided in the insolvent act, financial ruin might result to every banking institution in the state. By this act no injustice is done to any creditor or stockholder. The remarks of the court in Attorney General v. Continental Life Ins. Co., 53 How. Pr. 22, are applicable to the case before us: "His [the creditor's] power to wind it up, in which many others besides himself are interested, is only taken away. When, however, public policy and the interests of all, as well as his, demand its death, (and that is practically what is accomplished,—Neall v. Hill, 16 Cal. 150,) the officers of the state alone can take its life and administer its assets. That this policy is better, wiser, and safer for all, is most manifest. * * * Rights of stockholders and creditors who have no knowledge thereof should not be jeopardized by suits instituted by any stockholder under the Revised Statutes, and so brought for a fraudulent and wrecking purpose by collusion with the officers of the corporation, which rights can surely be imperiled if the remedies given by the Revised Statutes still exist. The temptation so to do was too great to make every stockholder and every creditor the depository of so great a power for mischief; and hence, it seems to me, that the act of 1853 wisely provided a new method of extinction and administration by which the power which gave the life is alone empowered to take it."

We cannot agree with counsel for respondents in their contention that the sole object and purpose of the act was visitation, and a report to the attorney general by the bank commissioners, or that there is no suggestion of any element of sequestration of the assets. The section referred to plainly provides that if the court should be of the opinion that it is unsafe for the corporation to continue to transact such business, and that it is insolvent, an injunction shall be issued, and thereupon such proceedings shall be taken against the corporation as may be decided upon by its creditors; and sections 18 and 19 of the act authorize the commissioners to issue subpoenas for witnesses, and maintain actions in the name of the people under the direction of the court. These experts will be enabled to administer upon the assets of the corporation with greater safety and more assured economy than such assets could be administered upon under the insolvent act of 1880.

Again, it is said there is nothing compulsory about the duty devolving upon the attorney general; that he is clothed with discretion, and, if he should fail in the proper case to bring suit, the creditors and other persons interested would have no remedy. There is no real danger, we think, to be apprehended from such a source. It is not to be assumed that sworn officers will fail in duty. Where, as in the case at bar, it is made to appear to the attorney general that the banking institution has suspended payment, closed its doors, and refused to pay its depositors the money that belongs to them, it is incredible that the attorney general, sworn to the performance of his duty, should refuse to bring an action under section 11 of this act; and if he did refuse it is not clear that a mandamus would not lie to compel him to act. But, however that may be, if the legislature did, in fact, intend to clothe the attorney general with absolute discretion in the matter, and the effect of the act were in certain cases to prevent the creditors from proceeding to wind up the affairs of the corporation themselves without the assistance of the attorney general, that fact alone would not invalidate the law. The legislature has the right, we think, to provide how proceedings for the winding up of the affairs of a particular class of corporations may be instituted, and by whom. It could, if it desired, exempt—as many states have done—banking institutions from the operation of the insolvent act entirely; and, as a matter of fact, there never was any provision by which either a corporation or an individual could be adjudged an insolvent debtor in involuntary proceedings in this state until the year 1876. The insolvent act of 1852 did not provide for involuntary insolvency proceedings.

It is claimed that proceedings against banking institutions under the insolvent act of 1880 are necessarily recognized by the amendment which includes corporations "now insolvent, or which may hereafter become insolvent, or be thrown into liquidation by process of law, or by the order or consent of its stockholders, directors, managing officers, managers, or creditors;" that this language embraces banking corporations which are insolvent as the result of an adjudication declaring them so to be; but we do not so understand the matter. The language "which is now insolvent, or which may hereafter become insolvent," refers to insolvency in fact, and not to adjudications of insolvency, and the reference to "liquidation by process of law, or by the order and consent of the stockholders," etc., does not necessarily refer to liquidation under the provisions of the insolvent act. If the practical effect of the winding up of the affairs of the corporation is a dissolution, as was said in Neall v. Hill, supra, it is equally true that a dissolution practically leads to a winding up of the business of a corporation, and the Code provides that upon the dissolution of any corporation the superior court may, on application of any creditor or stockholder or member, appoint a receiver, with power to collect debts, and divide the moneys and other property among the stockholders or members. Section 565, Code Civil Proc. By the provision of section 11, referred to, the power of the bank commissioners is simply extended to all cases where otherwise the "liquidation" or winding up of the business of the corporation would devolve upon receivers, or upon the directors or managers of the corporation, who are declared to be trustees of the creditors and stockholders upon dissolution, unless other persons are appointed by the court to settle the affairs of the corporation. Section 400, Civil Code.

We see no ground for holding that the remedies referred to are cumulative, or that the powers conferred by the bank commissioners' act are merely auxiliary to those conferred by the insolvent act of 1880. The objects of the new act are to provide new limitations and conditions, and an entirely different scheme for the winding up of the business of banking corporations. The power to arrest the business of the corporation is taken from five creditors, who may represent the comparatively insignificant sum of five hundred dollars in indebtedness, and placed in the hands of disinterested experts, subject to the discretion and approval of the court. The wisdom of these provisions is apparent. They offer security upon which the public may intrust their funds and otherwise deal with banking corporations. The act applies to both savings and commercial banks (Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Coleman, 53 Cal. 416) and it is well that this is so, because in their transactions they deal with all classes, and reach a larger number of people than any other kind of corporations. The provisions of the act are a bulwark against hasty action on the part of a few timid creditors in times of financial distress, and at all times against those who, from motives of greed or malice, would wreck the corporation, if it were in their power to do so, regardless of the consequences to others. To hold that the powers conferred by this act are merely auxiliary to those conferred by the insolvent act, would lead to palpable incongruities.

It is claimed by counsel for respondents that the act is unconstitutional, because it contravenes the provisions of article 6, §§ 4, 5, and article 4, § 25, subds. 3, 19, 33, and Id. § 24, of the constitution of this state. The superior court has not by the provisions of this act been deprived of its power to hear and determine matters of insolvency. The court, having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, is clothed with authority to exercise all means necessary to carry its jurisdiction into effect. Section 187, Code Civil Proc. The act simply names the experts who are to take the place of receivers who would otherwise be appointed. How far the acts of the commissioners may be controlled or reviewed is a question not before us. The act in question does not grant to any particular corporation any special or exclusive right, privilege, or immunity, nor is it subject to the criticism that it is local or special legislation. It does not, therefore, contravene the provisions of section 25, art. 4, of the constitution. We think that the title of the act sufficiently expresses the subject of the act, and is sufficiently general in its scope. It is not necessary that the title to the act should embrace an abstract of its contents. Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 226, 24 Pac. Rep. 383; Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 633, 29 Pac. Rep. 251. It is ordered that the writ issue as prayed for.

FOUNTAIN et al. v. SEMITROPIC LAND & WATER CO. (No. 19,142.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—RESCISSION BY VENDEE — WHEN ENTITLED TO RESCIND — MEASURE OF DAMAGES—JUDGMENT.

1. Where vendees of land, as part consideration for the contract, agree to make certain improvements within a specified time, and they do not make the improvements themselves, but procure them to be made by contract, they are not entitled, in case of rescission for failure of the vendor to perform, to recover of the latter the cost of such improvements, but only the reasonable value.

2. In an action by the vendees of land to rescind the contract it appeared that defendant agreed to pipe water to the land, which it failed to do; that plaintiffs agreed to clear and plant to fruit trees one-half the land within seven months, and the balance within a year thereafter; that they knew that water was needed as soon as trees or vines were planted, but they planted half the tract during the first season; that, though no water was piped and two-thirds of the trees died, they planted the other half the following season; and that they did not serve notice of rescission on defendant until they had been in possession over two years, and were in default on three installments of the purchase money. Held, that plaintiffs were not entitled to rescind because of defendant's failure to pipe the water.

3. Where such action is tried as an action to rescind, and not as an action for damages, a judgment in plaintiffs' favor for the cost of such improvements, and rescinding the sale, cannot stand.

4. The fact that defendant, by cross complaint, asked a rescission, and that plaintiffs' rights, and all improvements made by them, be forfeited, as provided in the contract, is insufficient to support the judgment where plaintiffs answered such cross complaint only by general denial, instead of setting up the substance of their complaint and assenting to the rescission.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Two actions (tried together) by J. H. Fountain and others against the Semitropic Land & Water Company to rescind a contract of sale of certain land by defendant to plaintiffs, and for damages. From a judgment in each case for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Willis, Cole & Craig and Walter Bordwell, for appellant. Goodcell & McIntyre, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. Two cases with the above title were tried together, and similar judgments entered in both cases. By stipulation the motion for a new trial, and the appeal from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial, are applicable to both. As the facts are in all material respects similar, it is only necessary to discuss one case, which will be that first set out in the transcript. The complaint in that case, after averring the incorporation of the defendant, sets out a contract between the parties in full. That contract, dated August 7, 1888, states that defendant agrees to sell to plaintiffs 53.09 acres of land in San Bernardino county for the sum of $6,636.25, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, to be paid in installments, the first installment of which, $2,212.09, was payable one year after date, and the last, $2,300.08, including interest, August 7, 1891. By the same instrument plaintiffs agree that as part consideration for the purchase of said land they will, on or before October 15, 1888, commence to clear off said land, and with all reasonable diligence proceed with said clearing until said land is entirely cleared off, and plow at least one-half of said tract and plant with good thrifty orange or other fruit trees by the 1st of March, 1889, and the balance within one year thereafter. The parties of the second part (plaintiffs) were given immediate possession, but upon default it is provided the party of the first part may enter and repossess the same, and the parties of the second part shall forfeit all payments made, which shall be taken and considered as rent and as liquidated damages for the failure of the parties of the second part to keep the covenants. It was again stipulated that time is of the essence of the contract, and that in case of default in making payments the parties of the second part shall forfeit all rights under the contract and all moneys paid thereon. The contract then proceeds as follows: "And the said party of the first part on receiving payment, at the time and in the manner above mentioned, of all of said purchase price, and the surrender of this agreement, agrees to execute and deliver to the said party of the second part, or to his assigns, a good and sufficient deed to said lands, in form of bargain and sale, together with one share of stock in the Lytle Creek Water and Improvement Company for each acre of land above agreed to be sold, which stock shall be issued by the said Lytle Creek Water and Improvement Company upon a basis of ten (10) shares of stock to each miner's inch of water, but no fractional share of said stock shall in any case be issued. The party of the first part also agrees to pipe the water to a point adjacent to each twenty-acre lot of said tract and each town lot above agreed to be sold, after which the second parties and other stockholders in said water company must bear the expense of keeping up the water system."

It is alleged that during the possession of plaintiffs they improved the premises by clearing, plowing, and planting the same with oranges and other orchard trees and grape vines, at a cost actually and necessarily incurred by them of $5,775, and have kept and performed the terms and conditions of said contract to be kept and performed on their part, except in so far as performance was rendered impossible by the failure of defendant to pipe water for irrigating purposes to a point adjacent to said land, as provided in said contract; that the water which defendant agreed to pipe to the lands was the only water available for that purpose, and without it orchard trees, vines, and trees could not be grown upon the lands; that defendant has ever since the date of the contract failed and refused to pipe water to said lands, though often requested so to do, whereby plaintiffs have been deprived of the use of said water for irrigation, or at all, and it has become impossible to profitably and successfully cultivate said land, or grow orchard or any trees or vines thereon; that plaintiffs have always been ready and willing to perform all the covenants on their part upon the compliance of defendant with his agreement to pipe said water, which it still refuses to do; that on the 29th day of August, 1890, they served upon defendant a written notice and demand for the entire rescission of said contract and transaction, for the repayment by defendant to plaintiffs of said sum of $5,775, the cost of improvements so made by them under said contract, and offered to return to defendant everything of value they had received from it, and to deliver possession of the land, and to pay the value of the use and occupation, but defendant refused, and still refuses, to rescind the contract, or to pay the costs of said improvements; that plaintiffs are still ready to perform their offer on condition that defendant pay them said cost, less the value of the use and occupation of said premises; that by reason of the failure of said defendant to pipe said water they have been damaged in the sum of $5,775, the cost of said improvements. They demand judgment that the contract be rescinded and canceled, for $5,775 and costs, and such other and further relief as shall be agreeable to equity.

The bill is framed as though the object of the pleader was to obtain a decree declaring the contract rescinded, and to obtain compensation for moneys expended in an attempt to execute it. It is hard to discover, however, any occasion for the interposition of a court of equity. If one party to a contract refuses to perform a covenant which is a condition precedent or concurrent, with the consent of the other party, the first consideration is whether it is such a breach as will justify a rescission. If the covenant be of minor importance, not going to the root of the matter, and one that can be readily compensated in damages, the party injured cannot rescind, but must perform his part of the contract, and seek compensation in damages. If, however, the breach be of a covenant, the nonperformance of which will render it impossible for the other party to perform, or will frustrate the whole purpose of the contract on his part, he still has two courses open to him, provided performance has not proceeded so far that it is impossible to place the opposite party pretty nearly in the position he was in before the contract was entered into. He may, acting promptly, rescind and recover moneys laid out and expended or paid, and the value of labor performed and materials furnished, under the contract, or he may decline to proceed in performance and sue for damages, in which case he may recover all loss occasioned by the breach, including profits he would have made if the contract had been performed, subject to the rule, of course, that remote and speculative damages cannot be recovered. The complaint does not contain a count for moneys laid out and expended, nor for labor performed, nor for materials furnished; nor does it contain any statements which would be the equivalents of such counts. If the plaintiffs are entitled to rescind, it does not necessarily follow that they can recover the cost of their improvements. No specific work was called for in the contract, but certain improvements in the way of clearing, plowing, and planting. The plaintiffs did not perform the work themselves, but caused it to be done through contract. If they could recover this at all, it would not be the cost, but the reasonable value. There is no allegation as to this in the complaint.

But I think, under the circumstances disclosed here, plaintiffs could not rescind and recover moneys laid out and expended by them under the contract. They paid no part of the purchase money. The improvements, if the contract had been fully performed on both sides, would have belonged to them. The provision in the contract requiring them was doubtless intended to insure performance and improve the security for the purchase money. We are not authorized to presume that defendant desired an orchard or vineyard as an investment. Plaintiffs, according to their own testimony, knew that water was required at least as early as the planting of the trees or vines. They nevertheless proceeded in March, 1889, to plant on half the land though no water had been piped, and, although two-thirds of the trees died, they went on again in the spring of 1890 and planted the remainder of the land, and did not serve the notice until they had been in possession more than two years, and were in default in the payment of three installments of the purchase money, amounting to $4,689.51. They might as well have gone on to the end of the term, and then sought to rescind if the speculation proved a bad one. Could they stop work and sue for damages, and is the complaint sufficient for that purpose? The mere fact that the plaintiffs served a notice for rescission would not prevent them from suing for damages. There is some confusion in the use of the word in such a case. It is often said that when one party to a contract is prevented from performing by the other, or the other is guilty of a breach of a condition so material that he may refuse to go on with it, and does thereupon refuse further performance and brings his suit for damages, he thereby rescinds the contract. It is said by Mr. Pomeroy, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, that a party cannot bring such an action without rescinding. Pom. Eq. Jur. § 110. On the other hand, it is often said, as it was by this court in Wainwright v. Weske, 82 Cal. 193, 23 Pac. Rep. 12: "In such an action plaintiff does not seek to rescind the contract. He affirms it, and seeks to recover damages by reason of the fraud arising out of the circumstances accompanying the entering into the contract." This rule seems more in consonance with our Code, which provides that a contract is extinguished by rescission. It is, however, largely a question of words, and cannot affect the rights of the parties. Had the cause been tried as an action for damages, it is possible the judgment might have been maintained. But it is very evident that it was not so tried. The difference is quite material. In the action for rescission in the proper sense, plaintiffs could recover for labor performed and materials furnished, irrespective of the question as to whether the whole adventure was necessarily a failure, even had defendant performed its contract.

In the action for damages the recovery could only be for the loss occasioned by the breach. It may have been that all moneys expended would have been lost, even had defendant performed. And, again, plaintiffs may be able to prove that they would have realized a large profit if they had been able to complete the contract. Whether the breach, if there was any, was so material as to justify plaintiffs in abandoning performance, is to some extent a question of fact. The evidence shows without conflict that water was furnished, though not in pipes. Plaintiffs accepted and used the water, still insisting, however, that it was not furnished according to the contract. Their complaint was that the supply was not regular, and was generally insufficient. Whether this was so defective a supply as to justify plaintiffs in their refusal to go on with the contract was a question of fact to be determined at the trial. From the reading of the contract it is difficult to say that defendant is required to lay pipes at any time before the deed would become due. If the contract must be construed as requiring water to be piped at once, it is because water was necessary as soon as the ground was planted.

The defendants filed a cross complaint, in which they allege the default of plaintiffs as to the payments due on the contract, and they ask that the contract be rescinded, and the rights of plaintiffs under it be declared forfeited, as also all improvements made by them as rent and liquidated damages, as provided in the contract. The plaintiffs answered this by a general denial. It seems, therefore, that both parties are seeking a rescission of the contract. I am not sure that I see what difference it would make in the consequences at whose instance a rescission was made. In either case each would be required to restore to the other everything of value received, and to pay for labor performed for him under it. Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. Rep. 280; Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 25 Pac. Rep. 749; Phelps v. Brown, 95 Cal. 572, 30 Pac. Rep. 774. Had plaintiffs set up, in answer to the cross-complaint, the substance of their complaint, at the same time assenting to the rescission, it would have gone far towards furnishing a support for the present judgment, but under the present pleadings I think that judgment cannot stand. I advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and that the parties be allowed to amend their pleadings if they shall be so advised.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the parties are allowed to amend their pleadings if they shall be so advised.

PEOPLE v. ABBOTT. (No. 20,985.)

BURGLARY — POSSESSION OF STOLEN PROPERTY — INSTRUCTION — EVIDENCE TO JUSTIFY — MISCONDUCT OF COURT.

1. In a burglary case it appeared that a Chinaman's trunk and pipe were stolen from the burglarized building. There was evidence that two persons carried a "China trunk" from the lot on which the building was situated about the time the crime was committed; that defendant and others were seen with such a trunk about that time; and that such Chinaman's trunk was found open two days afterwards, a considerable distance from the building. There was no evidence that a "China trunk" is any different from any other trunk. The pipe was put in evidence, but there was no testimony as to where it was found. Held, that the evidence did not justify an instruction as to the effect of possession of property recently stolen.

2. It is error to charge that the possession of stolen property soon after the taking, while not sufficient to justify a conviction, is a "guilty circumstance," and that defendant was bound to explain the possession in order to remove its effect.

3. Where a witness for the state, in a criminal case, is absent when wanted, and is brought in by an officer, it is error for the court, in the presence of the jury, to hold a colloquy with such witness, which tends to discredit defendant and his counsel, and lead the jury to believe that, if they were not guilty of a grave offense in procuring the absence of the witness, they were, in the opinion of the court, capable of committing it, and that such conduct on their part could only be induced by consciousness of defendant's guilt.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

George Abbott was convicted of burglary, and appeals. Reversed.

C. C. Stephens, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

HAYNES, C. An information charging Amos Abbott, George Abbott, and Albert Acevedo with burglary, committed on the 5th day of September, 1891, in the room of one Ah Sic, in the city of Los Angeles, was filed by the district attorney. The defendants severed. Appellant George Abbott pleaded not guilty, was tried, found guilty by the jury, and sentenced to imprisonment for the term of five years. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and from the judgment and the order denying a new trial defendant appeals.

A very large number of exceptions were taken by appellant upon the trial, and referred to in the brief of his counsel, but we regret to say that the brief gives us little aid beyond the mere reference to the folio in the transcript where the exceptions are found; and on the part of the people the brief of the attorney general, prepared and signed by his first deputy, is little more than a pert, if not impertinent, denial that there is anything of merit in the alleged errors referred to by appellant's counsel. Where the protection of the people against crime upon the one side and the liberty of the citizens is at stake upon the other, the questions involved are of such importance as to require a careful examination and discussion by counsel in order that just conclusions may be reached by the court. Ah Sic and Ah Poy, whose property is alleged to have been burglariously stolen, were partners and proprietors of a Chinese drug store on Marchessault street, in the city of Los Angeles. In the rear of the room occupied as a drug store was a room used as a public reception room. To reach this room persons passed from a door in the side of the drug store into a hall which extended back past two or three other rooms to a kitchen, and from this hall was an entrance into the room immediately in the rear of the drug store. The next room in the rear of the reception room was Ah Sic's sleeping room, in which the property alleged to have been stolen was kept. The testimony tends strongly to show that this reception room was visited by many persons, of all colors and nationalities, for the purpose, among other things, of purchasing Chinese lottery tickets; and on the evening of September 5th the defendant, with his brother and many other persons, were in this room for a considerable time,—how long will be hereafter noticed,—but the room appears to have been open, and different persons going to and coming from it from early in the evening until the discovery of the alleged burglary, about a quarter past 10 o'clock. Between the storeroom and this reception room was a small glass window, through which one in the drug store could observe those in the reception room, and those in the reception room could see those coming into the storeroom. The burglary was effected by boring through a board partition between Ah Sic's room and an unoccupied building near or adjoining that room so as to remove the boards for a sufficient space to take out, through the opening, a trunk which is said to have been stolen. The only article, aside from the trunk, shown to have been stolen, was an opium pipe, which Ah Sic testified was on that evening lying upon his bed in the same room. In the trunk was some clothing, not described in the evidence, a small bamboo basket containing silver, and gold in a buckskin bag, amounting in all to some seven or eight hundred dollars. A Chinaman named Ah Tung testified that a little after 10 o'clock the night of the burglary he saw the defendant and another man carrying a chest, coming out of Ah Sic's back yard, and saw them go out through the gate of the fence, but he did not know at that time of the burglary, and did not think there was anything wrong, but next morning learned it was "stealing." Pierce Boyle, a witness on the part of the prosecution, testified that he saw two men coming out of the gate from the Chinaman's back yard; that they went under a pepper tree, and put the box down there, and then blew a whistle on their fingers, and two more young men came up; and further testified in that connection: "Well, then I saw the other two young men come up round a big load of hay there in the middle of the street. They got the box, and I told them, 'Hello, boys; hold on there;' and I picked up a rock and threw the rock after them, and then they blew a whistle. These two men had a box between them, running, sort of like a Chinaman's. They were what I would call trotting. They came with the box within 15 feet of me. I measured it since. When I first saw them they were coming from the Chinaman's house." This witness did not identify any of the men he saw in connection with the box. This witness fixed the time of this transaction at "10 o'clock, or may be a quarter past." Ah Ngau testified that he saw the defendant and three other men with a Chinese chest or trunk at the corner of Alameda street and the convent; that he was coming up from the old railroad depot towards Chinatown, and they were going towards the convent; that the defendant and another one with him was carrying the chest, and the other two followed two or three steps behind; that when he got to his room, about two blocks from where he met them, it was a quarter after 10; that he had been to a laundry near the old depot to see a friend. Ah Ging testified that he went to the old depot with a friend who was going to take the train for San Francisco; that they went a little after 10 o'clock to the depot. As he was going he saw the defendant, and another whom he did not know, carrying a chest. That he knew the two that were following by sight, but not their names. That where he saw them was between Alameda street and a small street running into it from the west, just opposite the lumber mill. That they were crossing Alameda street, and he was going towards the depot. "The burglary occurred Saturday night, and on Monday at noon the trunk or chest was found in a corn field, down towards the river, a considerable distance from the place of the burglary. The trunk had been broken open and the clothing scattered around. Neither the pipe nor any of the contents of the trunk were at any time found in the possession or in any manner connected with the defendant, and there was no evidence of his possession of the stolen property other than that above stated, namely, that he was seen with others carrying a box or chest, but there was no evidence tending to identify the box or chest which was carried with the one that was stolen, other than the circumstances above stated.

I have stated so much of the testimony for the purpose of showing the materiality of certain instructions given and refused upon the questions of identification of the defendant, and inferences to be drawn from the possession of stolen property. Upon the latter question the court, at the request of the district attorney, charged the jury as follows: "The mere possession of stolen property, unexplained by the defendant, however soon after the taking, is not sufficient to justify a conviction; it is merely a guilty circumstance, which, taken in connection with other testimony, is to determine the question of guilt. Yet if you believe from the evidence that the defendant was found in the possession of the property described in the evidence, or claiming to be the owner thereof, after the alleged burglary, this is a circumstance tending in some degree to show guilt, but not sufficient, standing alone and unsupported by other evidence, to warrant you in finding him guilty. There must be, in addition to proof of possession of property stolen from the premises described in evidence, proof of corroborating circumstances tending of themselves to establish guilt. These corroborating circumstances may consist of acts or conduct or declarations of the defendant, or any other circumstances tending to show the guilt of the accused. If the jury believe from the evidence the property mentioned in evidence was stolen from the premises described in evidence, and was seen in the possession of the defendant shortly after being stolen, the failure of the defendant to account for such possession or to show that such possession was honestly obtained, is a circumstance tending to show his guilt, and the accused is bound to explain the possession in order to remove the effect of the possession as a circumstance to be considered in connection with other suspicious facts, if the evidence disclosed any such." Conceding, for the moment, that the instruction as given correctly stated the law as an abstract proposition, it was not applicable to the facts of the present case. Before a defendant can properly be called upon to account for the possession of stolen property, the circumstances must be such as would make silence as to such possession an evidence of guilt. Here the fact of possession was denied. The defendant could not explain his possession of the goods without admitting that he had possession. If he had been arrested with the trunk in his hands, and had been asked by the officer where and how he got it, he would have been called upon to speak, and his silence, if he refused to speak, as well as his answer, if false, would have been evidence against him. Defendant's alleged possession of the property depended upon a double identification: First, that the trunk or chest carried by the two men was the property stolen from Ah Sic; and, second, that defendant was one of the men who carried it. The only identification of the trunk was that the one found in the corn field on Monday was the one taken from Ah Sic the Saturday night preceding, while the only evidence tending to identify the trunk carried by the men with the one found in the corn field was that it was "a China trunk;" but there was no evidence that a China trunk is different from any other trunk. No other description was attempted by any of the witnesses who claimed to have seen the defendant helping to carry it. The pipe was produced in evidence, but there is no testimony from beginning to end as to where it was found. It was not in the trunk at the time of the burglary, and it is not probable that it would have been stolen from the bed, and carried to the corn field, and left there with the broken trunk; nor was any part of the contents of the trunk found in possession of the defendant, or in any manner accounted for. Nor was the identification of the defendant as one of the men who carried the trunk more satisfactory. The evidence of the Chinamen who testified that they recognized the defendant as one of the men who carried the trunk was not only open to serious doubt and criticism, but the evidence on the part of the defendant, if true, would seem to make it clear that the man identified by the Chinaman as the defendant could not have been the defendant. Wills, in his work on Circumstantial Evidence, 6th American from the 4th London Ed., p. 63, in discussing the subject under consideration here, says: "The rule under discussion is occasionally attended with uncertainty in its application from the difficulty attendant upon the positive identification of articles of property alleged to have been stolen; and it clearly ought never to be applied where there is reasonable ground to conclude that the witnesses may be mistaken, or where from any other cause identity is not satisfactorily established."

In the cases cited at the end of the above quotation, it will be seen that the circumstances under which instructions similar to the above were given did not involve the uncertainties as to the identification of the property or of the person that were so prominent here. In People v. Gill, 45 Cal. 285, four horses were stolen during the night, and the next day the defendant was seen riding one of the horses, accompanied by another man, and the two had the four stolen horses with them. There seems to have been no question whatever as to identity made in the case. In People v. Clough, 59 Cal. 438, the defendant was charged with robbery. The person robbed immediately notified the chief of police, who made immediate pursuit, and captured the defendant within a few minutes after the robbery was committed. The property which had been taken from the prosecuting witness was found upon the defendant, and the only explanation he gave of such possession was that he had "picked up the watch." In People v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 457, "the property alleged to have been stolen consisted of cattle, which were found in defendant's possession, who undertook to account for his possession and ownership. In such cases as these an instruction upon the subject of possession of the stolen property shortly after the alleged larceny is proper, but those cases are very different from the one at bar. I think, too, the matter of this instruction is subject to serious criticism. It states directly that the possession of stolen property soon after the taking, while not sufficient to justify a conviction, is "a guilty circumstance." In People v. Cline, 74 Cal. 575, 16 Pac. Rep. 391, the jury was instructed that "the mere possession of stolen property recently stolen is not of itself sufficient evidence to convict. The possession of stolen property, supported by other evidence tending to show guilt, is a strong circumstance tending to show guilt." This court said, Searls, C. J., delivering the opinion: "It is not a question of law upon which the court should instruct the jury, but one of fact, which is wholly within the province of the latter. In deducing the ultimate fact of guilt or innocence, they are the sole judges of the weight to be given to the probative fact of possession of property recently stolen, and stamping the character of such possession." In the case of State v. Hodge, 50 N. H. 521, in discussing this question, the court said: "The resemblance between inconclusive presumptions of law and strong presumptions of fact cannot have escaped notice,—the effect of which being to assume something as true until rebutted; and, indeed, in the Roman law and other systems where the decision of both law and fact is intrusted to a single judge, the distinction between them becomes in practice almost imperceptible; but it must never be lost sight of in the common law, where the functions of judge and jury should always be kept distinct. Unfortunately, however, the line of demarcation between the different species of presumptions has not always been observed with the requisite precision. We find the same presumption spoken of by judges, sometimes as a presumption of law, sometimes as a presumption of fact, sometimes as a presumption which juries should be advised to make, sometimes as one which it is obligatory on them to make. * * * The law is burdened and obscured by a great mass of common opinion, general understanding, practice, precedent, and authority (including the presumption from possession of stolen property) that has passed for law, but is in truth not law, but fact, coming down to us largely by descent from the ancient custom of the judge giving the jury his opinion of the evidence. To clear the law of this incumbrance, revive elementary principles strictly legal in their nature, separate the province of the court from the province of the jury, and maintain the latter in its entirety, is a duty put upon us by the constitution. * * * When, therefore, we have come to the conclusion that the presumption from possession of stolen goods is a presumption of fact, we find ourselves prohibited by the constitution from delivering to the jury the presumption as to a result binding upon them, or a rule by which they are to be governed." The statement, therefore, in the instruction that the possession of the property was a guilty circumstance, required the jury to give weight to some extent to the fact of possession, and, with the further statement that the accused is bound to explain the possession in order to remove its effect, under the circumstances of this case, I think was error. It would have been proper for the court to have informed the jury that the possession of the property by the defendant, if they found as a fact that he had such possession, might be considered by them in connection with all the circumstances of the case, but not that they were bound, as the instruction implied, to give it some weight against the defendant, or that the defendant, if they found he had possession of the property, was placed under such circumstances as required him to account for that possession; for whether the circumstances were such as to require an explanation is itself a question of fact which the jury are authorized to determine, and was not a matter of law which they were bound to observe. The defendant was not apprehended with the property in his possession, and no circumstance transpired prior to the trial requiring him to speak at all in regard to his alleged possession of the trunk. If he had not gone upon the stand as a witness, no comment could be made to the jury upon his failure on that occasion to account for his possession of the property, and, that being true, his failure while upon the stand to give any account of a possession which he denied having is equally placed beyond comment either by the district attorney in his argument, or by the court in its instructions to the jury.

Upon the trial, Pierce Doyle was called as a witness for the people. Upon being sworn, the following colloquy occurred between the court and the witness: "The Court: Why did you leave the court room? Answer. I thought I could go down and get a drink and get back in time. Question. Did Mr. Stephens offer you any money to go away? A. No, sir; no one gave me none. Q. Did he tell you to go away? A. No, sir; he did not speak to me. Q. Did the defendant tell you to go away? A. No, sir. Q. Did the defendant offer to give you any money to go away? A. No, sir; no one did. The Court, in the presence of the jury: This looks very singular, indeed." (Mr. Stephens was defendant's attorney.) The transcript contains the following explanation of this colloquy: "Amos Abbott, a witness and brother of defendant, left suddenly for the Islands the day before this trial was called. A motion for continuance by defendant was based on such absence. Counsel for defendant refused to have the absent witness' testimony, which was complete and full, taken on former trial of same case, read in evidence, and persisted in his motion. The witness Doyle was wanted the night before, and was absent. He came into the court room before court called, and when wanted was absent, and an officer was sent to bring him in, and the court interrogated him as above." The affidavit for continuance above referred to was made by the defendant, and was sufficient in substance and in form. The fact that the witness had before testified, and that his testimony could be read, the prosecution assenting thereto, did not make it improper that a continuance should be applied for, even though it may have justified the court in refusing the motion. Whether the court erred in refusing the motion need not be considered, as the presence of the witness was procured, and the defendant was therefore not prejudiced by the denial of his motion. There was nothing, however, in that matter, nor in the absence of the witness Doyle, that could possibly justify the grave imputation against the defendant or his counsel implied in the above-quoted examination of the witness by the court. It inevitably tended to discredit both the defendant and his counsel, and to lead the jury to believe that if they were not guilty of a very grave offense against the administration of justice in procuring the absence of the witness, that they were, in the opinion of the court, at least capable of committing it, and that such conduct on their part could only be induced by a consciousness that defendant was guilty of the crime for which he was being tried. That this must have operated to the prejudice of the defendant throughout the trial is apparent, and for this reason, if no other, a new trial should be granted. No improper motive is attributed to the court in this matter, but if the circumstances were such as to impress the court with a grave suspicion that the witness had been tampered with, the investigation should not have been proceeded with in the presence of the jury, further than to inquire of the witness the cause of his absence. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial granted.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment.

FIELD v. SHORB et al. (No. 19,194.)

GIFT—VALIDITY—CAPACITY OF DONOR—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. A gift of a check and certificate of deposit is established where the donor, being a business man, after having expressed his intention to make the gift, indorses the check and certificate, which he had left in the hands of the donor for safe-keeping, and redelivers them to the donee, who collects them, the donor never asking for them or their proceeds again.

2. A verdict on a finding of fact will be set aside where it is against the great current of evidence, although one or two general statements of one or two witnesses bring it within the rule which governs where there is a material conflict of evidence.

3. In an action for an accounting and to set aside a gift as made when the donor was insane, it appeared that he was very close in money matters, and uncleanly in habits and dress; that he shrank from the use of water, and objected to changing his soiled clothes; that he talked of women in an obscene way, and when angry swore badly; that he played on the piano without extracting any music, and then walked around the room in a quaint, unnatural manner. These were his characteristics for months before his death, in August, 1890. Held, that a finding that deceased was sane until July 1st,—two days before he made the gift,—and insane from that time until the date of his death, was against the evidence.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by D. W. Field, public administrator, against A. S. Shorb and others, for an accounting. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wilson & Bulla and Stephen M. White, for appellants. W. W. Holcomb and Wells, Monroe & Lee, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought by the public administrator, acting as the administrator of the estate of Daniel J. Harris, deceased; and in form it purports to be an action to obtain an accounting of the transactions between the defendants, A. S. Shorb and his wife, Mattie L. Shorb, and the said Daniel J. Harris in his lifetime. But the main averments of the complaint are that on the 13th day of May, 1890, the deceased drew a check for $500, payable to Mattie L. Shorb, and delivered the same to her; that on the 3d day of July, 1890, the deceased drew another check for $1,288.25, payable to said Mattie L. Shorb, and delivered the same to her; and that also on said 3d day of July, 1890, the said deceased delivered to said Mattie L. Shorb a certain certificate of deposit for $25,000; that said A. S. and Mattie L. Shorb claim that said two checks and said certificate were delivered to the said Mattie L. by the deceased as gifts; but that they were not given to said Mattie L. as a gift, and always remained a part of the property of the deceased until his death, and since then have been assets of his estate. Several banking companies were also made defendants, upon averments that portions of the money collected upon said drafts and certificate are on deposit with said banking companies. Some twenty different issues were submitted to a jury, who returned specific answers to four or five of the issues, imperfect answers to two or three others, and "no answer" to the rest. The court then made findings, adopting generally the judgment of the jury where it was expressed, and upon the findings judgment went in favor of the defendants for the $500 check, the court holding that it was a gift, but against the defendants as to the other check and as to the said certificate of deposit. The defendants appealed from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

The complaint seems to go upon three theories: First, that the check and certificate were obtained from the deceased by the defendants (the Shorbs) by means of a conspiracy through which they were obtained by undue influence exerted upon the deceased; second, that they were delivered to Mrs. Shorb merely for safe-keeping, and always remained the property of the deceased; and, third, that at the time they were delivered, on July 3, 1890, the deceased was of unsound mind, and incapable of giving the said certificate and check for any purpose. About seven or eight pages of the complaint, as it appears on the printed transcript, is made up of averments of fraudulent conspiracy entered into by the Shorbs for the purpose of obtaining undue influence over the deceased, and obtaining from him the certificate and check. It is averred, with many details and frequent repetitions, that the defendants, the Shorbs, fraudulently conspired to obtain undue influence over the deceased by great exhibitions of friendship and affection, by trying to persuade the deceased that they were his only friends, by persuading him to employ the said A. S. Shorb as his physician, by supplying him with and inducing him to use large quantities of intoxicating liquor for the purpose of weakening his mental condition, and by many other acts which tended to give them control over him; and that thus having fraudulently according to their conspiracy and plan obtained great influence over him, they induced him by solicitation to give said check and certificate to the said Mattie L. Shorb. With respect to this part of the complaint it is sufficient to say that the court found that none of the said allegations as to said alleged conspiracy and fraudulent purpose to obtain influence over said deceased were true.

With respect to the second theory of the complaint above noticed, we suppose that the findings of the court are to be taken to mean that the said check and the said certificate were given to Mrs. Shorb on the 3d day of July, 1890, merely for safe-keeping, and not as a gift. But we find no evidence sufficient to sustain such a finding,—that is, leaving out of view for the present the question of the mental unsoundness of the deceased at the time. The check was drawn payable to Mrs. Shorb, and was immediately collected by her, and the proceeds deposited in bank to her account, and it does not appear that the deceased ever called upon her afterwards for said proceeds, or made any question about it; and there is no evidence tending to show that the check was not given to her as her own property, while her own testimony is directly to the point that it was a gift. With respect to the certificate, there is the testimony of three witnesses that he had expressed his intention before the 3d of July to give said certificate to Mrs. Shorb as a gift; and there is the direct testimony of Mrs. Shorb that he did so give it to her on that day, and there is no testimony to the contrary. Moreover, there is the unquestioned act of the deceased in indorsing said certificate and delivering it to Mrs. Shorb. This certificate had been in the month of May previous given to Mrs. Shorb for safe-keeping. It was a negotiable instrument, and when given to her in May for safe-keeping had not been indorsed; the legal title thereto had not passed to Mrs. Shorb; and she could not have disposed of it in any way. But afterwards, when the certificate was brought to him on the 3d of July for the purpose, as Mrs. Shorb testifies, of making a gift of it to her, he then indorsed his name on the back of said certificate, and delivered it to Mrs. Shorb. This indorsement and the delivery of the certificate to Mrs. Shorb, transferred to her the entire right to collect said certificate, or to dispose of it as she thought fit. And there is not the slightest evidence, either at that time or afterwards, that he intended her to collect the money and give it to him. The deceased was a man who owned large properties, and was in the habit of keeping bank accounts, both in the territory of Washington and in Los Angeles; and he had certainly the ordinary business knowledge of negotiable bank paper, and the methods by which the title to the same is transferred. Taking all these matters into consideration, we see no evidence upon which to found a reasonable belief that he did not intend to give said certificate to Mrs. Shorb in manner as she testified; that is, presuming, as before stated, that he was not so mentally unsound as not to know the quality of his acts, or to do ordinary business. The only real question in the case, therefore, relates to the condition of the mind of the deceased on the said 3d day of July, 1890, when these transactions took place.

With respect to the mental soundness of the deceased on said 3d of July, the question propounded to the jury, and the answer thereto, are as follows: "Was the mind of Daniel J. Harris during his last illness weak, and if it was, for about how long was it in such condition? Yes; from about July 1st until his death." Upon this subject the court first found as follows: "The mind of Daniel J. Harris during his last illness, from about July 1st until his death, was weak and unsound;" and then as follows: "Prior to the 1st of July, 1890, Daniel J. Harris was not of unsound mind, but then, and at all times thereafter, until the time of his death, he was of unsound mind, and not competent to make a gift of said sum," etc. These findings of the court were, we presume, founded upon the judgment of the jury, as expressed in their finding as above stated. We are adverse to holding that a finding by a jury or trial court on an issue of fact is not warranted by the evidence, whatever we might think as to its preponderance, where there is presented a fair, reasonable ground for a difference of opinion, and where a conclusion either way could not be considered as the necessary result of the exercise of an unsound judgment. But where the great current of the evidence is against the verdict, and we cannot escape the conviction that it is wrong, we should not be deterred from setting it aside by the contention that one or two general statements or assertions of one or two witnesses bring the case within the rule which governs in cases where there is a material "conflict of evidence." And in the case at bar we cannot resist the conclusion that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the unsoundness of the mind of the deceased on July 3, 1890. The facts upon which the mental weakness or unsoundness—insanity not being claimed—are based are certain characteristics and conduct of the deceased. As to those characteristics themselves, there is a great conflict of testimony,—some of the witnesses making them very extravagant, and others describing them as little, if any, out of the normal. We assume, however, that the jury had the right to take the most highly-colored picture. Those characteristics were mainly these: That the deceased was very close and penurious in money matters, or, as some witnesses said, niggardly and miserly; that, although a man of means, he worried over the expenses of his last sickness, and said he would become a pauper; that he was loath to buy proper food; that he was untidy and uncleanly in his habits, did not like to be washed, and could with difficulty be induced to make necessary changes of clothing; that he was subject to crying spells, and sometimes without apparent cause; that he frequently grumbled to himself; that he would get mad and swear terribly; that he feared people were friendly to him because they wanted his money; that he talked about women in an obscene way; that he occasionally beat upon the keys of a piano without being able to play that instrument, and would then walk about the room in a quaint or unnatural way; and that he predicted that the city of Los Angeles would be visited in 1890 by an epidemic which would kill many thousands of people, and which he could avert by going away. These were the main characteristics, although we do not pretend to give the details; and the witnesses differed very much as to the degree or intensity of these traits of character. (We leave out of view the bald assertion of one of the witnesses, who was his nurse from some time in May to the middle of July, and who disliked the deceased, and was evidently very hostile to appellants, that deceased was guilty "every day" of a certain private practice that sometimes impairs the mind. He gave no details, and never mentioned the subject to either of the doctors in attendance while he was acting as nurse; and neither of the three doctors who attended upon the deceased noticed any symptoms of such a practice. Moreover, the weak physical condition of the deceased, produced by heart disease and consequent dropsy, showed to the common mind, even without the information given by Dr. Salisbury, that the thing asserted by the witness was "impossible." We apprehend that neither the jury nor judge gave any weight to the assertion.)

If the jury had found that the foregoing characteristics and acts of deceased were, during the time when they were shown to have existed and to have been committed, sufficient to warrant the conclusion that he was of unsound mind, we might not, perhaps, have felt called upon to set aside the finding, although we would not have looked upon the evidence supporting it as very strong. But the jury, in the face of these characteristics and acts, which were the same for a long period before the 1st of July as after that date, found that the deceased was of unsound mind only "from about July 1st until his death;" and the court, following, no doubt, the judgment of the jury, found that "prior to the 1st day of July, 1890, Daniel J. Harris was not of unsound mind," but that then and afterwards he was. The evidence discloses the deceased afflicted as early as April, 1890, with the last illness—heart disease and dropsy—which caused his death on the 18th of August following; and his characteristics upon which the finding of mental unsoundness was based were exhibited continuously throughout that entire period, and were as full and pronounced during any one part of that period as during any other. The first witness introduced by respondent was a physician who attended the deceased from the 6th of May until the 23d of June, when he was discharged; and he described nearly all the traits of character and conduct of the deceased which are relied on, as existing in their fullest development during the said period of his attendance, and testified that he was much better in health on June 23d than he was when he first saw him on May 6th. The next witness (Hapgood) testified to the same things as occurring during ten days in May while he nursed the deceased. The next (Hunsaker) testified to many of the same things as occurring nine months before the deceased died. The next, a milkman, (Burch,) testified to the said characteristics and conduct of the deceased as existing during all the months of May, June, July, and August. The next witness on the subject, (Brown,) who was very pronounced in his statements of the condition of the deceased, described his traits of character and conduct as observed by the witness "in the month of May," and said that he "was not much acquainted with him from that time on." The next witness (Anderson) who described the characteristics of the deceased referred to a period so early that the objection of the remoteness of his testimony was made. It referred to visits made by the deceased to the office of the witness before the last illness of the former. This witness testified to the prediction by deceased of the epidemic at Los Angeles, and he said it occurred "during the winter of 1889-90, and up to March and April." The next witness (Davis) testified to the epidemic matter as occurring before the last illness of deceased. The next witness, (Mrs. Trundey,) who also testified to the condition of the deceased, said: "The last time I saw him was in the early part of last year; in the spring or summer." The next (Bryant) testified to the condition of the deceased from "May to August," and when describing his characteristics made no distinction as to time. The next and the strongest witness for respondent (Purssord) was employed as nurse from May 18th to July 15th, and, with one exception, hereinafter noticed, he describes all the facts which he marshals as showing the characteristics of the deceased as continuously existing from the moment he first went to the house on May 18th. The only witnesses introduced by respondent whose testimony as to the conduct and characteristics related solely to a period after July 1st were McCallister, Helander, and B. F. Harris; and their descriptions of the deceased differed in no material way from the descriptions given by the other witnesses for respondent, and which applied to the whole period from April to the 1st of July. And it was testified by witnesses for the appellants that many of the characteristics of deceased above referred to had existed for several years previous to 1890, although in the opinion of these witnesses the said characteristics did not amount to mental unsoundness. Moreover, the long hypothetical question, covering two pages of the transcript, put by respondent to certain medical experts, in which all the characteristics and acts of deceased claimed to be peculiar were described with high coloring, and frequent repetition, deferred, in terms, to all the months of "May, June, July, and a part of August, 1890," and was substantially as fully applicable to May and June as to July.

It was found, however, that the mind of the deceased was not unsound until the 1st of July; and, that being so, was there any evidence reasonably sufficient to support the finding that his mind became unsound within the three days between the 30th of June and the 3d of July,—the important day on which the alleged gifts were made? There was no such evidence. We are not called upon to determine whether the evidence of the condition of the deceased during the months of May and June would have been sufficient to warrant a finding that during those months he was of unsound mind; for the finding is that it was not sufficient for that purpose. And there was no different evidence—and therefore no evidence—to support a finding that he was mentally unsound on July 1st. It is proper to say that respondent makes some little contention that deceased had a paralytic stroke that might help out the finding under discussion. But there was no evidence of a paralytic stroke which a sensible jury could have attached the slightest importance to. One of the witnesses for the respondent—a nurse—did make the naked assertion that one morning when deceased fell on getting out of bed "he had a paralytic stroke;" but the witness was not a medical expert, and the evidence nowhere shows any symptoms of paralysis. The witness does not pretend that he said anything to the attending physician about a paralytic stroke, and the physician says nothing about any such occurrence. Afterwards, Dr. Salisbury, an entirely disinterested, and apparently an exceedingly intelligent, witness, attended the deceased for a week. He examined the case very thoroughly, and explained very fully and clearly the character of the disease with which deceased was afflicted; but he says nothing of any evidence of paralysis. The deceased during his entire sickness was subject to good and bad spells. At times he was quite weak physically, and his disease made it frequently difficult for him to walk about much, and it was quite probable that he had a fall; but there was certainly no evidence at all sufficient to warrant a finding that he had a stroke of paralysis. Moreover, it is clear that the time alluded to by the witness was after July 3d. He first said that it was "about the 1st of July;" but he afterwards said, "I got Mr. Brown to telegraph for Mr. Harris' nephew sometime about the 1st of July, when he had this stroke." But Mr. Brown testified that he telegraphed for the nephew "about July 9th;" and then, having testified that the telegram would show the exact time, it was produced, and was of the date of July 10th. It appeared also that after this the health of the deceased was better than usual. Under these circumstances, the supposition that the mind of the deceased suddenly became unsound between June 30th and July 3d, by reason of a stroke of paralysis, affords no prop which helps to sustain the finding in question. Indeed, it is quite probable that the finding was the result of a notion frequently entertained by jurors (and sometimes by courts) that a man should dispose of his property in contemplation of death in such manner as to suit the tastes and ideas of propriety of the jurors. It was probably thought that deceased should not have given so much to one not of his blood, when he had collateral kin; and that the $500 check which they found him sound-minded enough in May to give was enough for Mrs. Shorb. But, as we said in Estate of Spencer, 96 Cal. 456, 31 Pac. Rep. 453, a person in thus disposing of property is "not called upon to consult the wishes or views of jurors or courts." We notice that at respondent's request the jury were instructed that "an unnatural disposition of property is a circumstance," etc. Of course, when a man wills all or most of his property away from his wife or children with whom he lived on apparently friendly terms, or even from other relatives with whom he was intimate, and to whom he seemed attached, that fact should have weight in determining the mental condition of the testator; but such a consideration should have little, if any, force in the case at bar. The deceased was a widower without children or lineal descendants, and had no kith or kin living nearer California than the state of New York. He ran away from home when a boy, and lived most of his life on the Pacific coast, and had not seen any of his collateral relations for 35 years, except a nephew who, at the solicitation of the witness Brown, came out from the east during the last illness of the deceased, and stayed two weeks, the deceased furnishing him money to go back. On the other hand, the defendants, the Shorbs, had been quite intimate with him for several years. They seem to have been about his only family friends, and had done him many friendly offices. The lady whom he married, and who died in 1888, had before her marriage lived with said defendants. During the marriage there was a difficulty between the deceased and his wife, and the latter brought a suit for divorce, but through the efforts and influence of the Shorbs a reconciliation took place, and the parties seemed to live very happily together until the death of the wife. Afterwards the intimate relation was continued between the deceased and the defendants, and during his long final illness Mrs. Shorb and her daughter ministered daily to his wants, taking him delicacies to eat, trying to brighten his gloomy and lonely surroundings, and doing for him many things in their nature unpleasant. Under these circumstances, we see nothing "unnatural" about his making the gifts in question. It is to be observed also that these gifts did not include all his property. He was worth in round numbers $100,000, and the gifts amounted to only about one-fourth of that sum.

It is difficult to know what value to attach to the findings (27 and 28) that the Shorbs, by reason of their previous acquaintance, sympathy, attentions, etc., but "not otherwise," could "easily influence and control" the deceased, "but not so as to deprive him entirely of his free will;" for it is expressly found that the said defendants did not use any influence to procure the gifts in question. It is expressly found that "neither the defendant Mattie L. Shorb nor the defendant A. S. Shorb importuned or solicited said Harris to transfer or deliver to Mattie L. Shorb either the check for five hundred ($500) heretofore referred to, or the check for twelve hundred eighty-eight and 25-100 dollars, ($1,288.25,) heretofore referred to, or the said certificate of deposit for twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000) issued by the Merchants' National Bank of Tacoma;" and all the averments of the complaint as to a conspiracy by defendants to obtain and use undue influence over the deceased are expressly negatived by the findings. If the said findings (27 and 28) mean anything more than that defendants merely had that influence which comes from kindness and affection, and which is not "undue," then they are not supported by the evidence, and are inconsistent with other findings. But, under any view that may be taken of them it is clear that the one pivotal question in the case is, was deceased on July 3d of unsound mind, and incapable of making a gift? Under the foregoing views, we do not deem it necessary to discuss the other questions presented in the record. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded.

MESERVE et al. v. POMONA LAND & WATER CO. et al. (No. 19,112.)

HARMLESS ERROR.

Where the record shows that evidence offered by plaintiff was admitted subject to defendant's objections, plaintiff cannot complain of the subsequent failure of the court to rule on the objections.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by E. A. Meserve and others against the Pomona Land & Water Company and others. There was a judgment in favor of defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Chapman & Hendrick and Edwin A. Meserve, for appellants. Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiffs claim to own, and to be entitled to divert and use upon their lands, 567-10,000 of all the waters flowing in and from the San Antonio canyon, which is located partly in Los Angeles county and partly in San Bernardino county; and they brought this action to have their title to the part of the said waters, so claimed by them, quieted, as against the defendants. The answer denied all the material averments of the complaint, and set up in bar of the action the statute of limitations. The court below found the facts and gave judgment in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiffs appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The findings cover all the issues, and the principal contention of the appellants is that they were not justified by the evidence. The evidence set out in the statement is oral and documentary, and, while much of it is only briefly stated in substance, it still extends over more than 150 pages of the printed transcript. The facts of the case are numerous, and in many respects complicated, and to state them so they could be intelligently understood would require a long opinion, which would never be of use in any other case. Counsel on both sides have argued the questions presented at great length, and with marked ability; but to follow them, and state their points, would subserve no useful purpose. It is enough to say that, after carefully going over the record, we think the evidence must be held sufficient to justify the findings, and hence that they cannot be disturbed on appeal.

The statement contains but one specification of errors of law occurring at the trial, and that is as follows: "The court erred in not ruling upon the objections interposed by the plaintiffs to the introduction of evidence in this case, where the rulings of the court were reserved." The action of the court, complained of, is this: The plaintiffs offered in evidence a certain written agreement, and the defendants objected to it "on the ground that it was an agreement between other parties, and was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The Court: It will be allowed, subject to your objection, and passed upon hereafter." It is said for appellants: "If the court ever ruled upon this question, it nowhere appears; and we say that the court erred in not ruling, and that we are entitled to a new trial for that reason." The word "plaintiffs," in the specification, should probably be read "defendants," for otherwise the specification would not be at all applicable. Assuming, however, that the specification is sufficient, and no ruling was made by the court upon the objections of defendants, still no error prejudicial to the plaintiffs is shown. They offered the written agreement, and the court admitted it in evidence, and, so far as appears, did not afterwards exclude it. Presumptively, therefore, they got all the benefit from the agreement which they were entitled to, and have nothing now to complain of. It follows that the order appealed from must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

MESERVE v. POMONA LAND & WATER CO. (No. 19,113.)

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by Edwin A. Meserve against the Pomona Land & Water Company for damages and an injunction. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chapman & Hendrick and Edwin A. Meserve, for appellant. Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to recover damages, and for an injunction. The defendant had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The case, in every material respect, is like the one just decided, numbered 19,112. 34 Pac. Rep. 508. The two cases were submitted at the same time, and on the same briefs, and must be decided in the same way. For the reasons stated in the opinion in the other case, the order appealed from in this case must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

CAVANAUGH v. JACKSON. (No. 18,119.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION—PAYMENT OF TAXES.

Code Civil Proc. § 325, provides that one claiming title by adverse possession must have paid all the taxes during the five years of his adverse occupancy. Held that, the adverse claimant having paid the taxes for that number of years, it was immaterial that some of the taxes during that time had also been paid by the original owner.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by Joseph Cavanaugh against Samuel Jackson for the recovery of realty. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. B. Warren and Gillis & Tapscott, (T. M. Osmont, of counsel), for appellant. Brown & Farraher, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action for the recovery of real estate. The defendant set up title by adverse possession, and his claim was held to be well founded by the trial court. The sole question arising upon this appeal rests upon the construction of that provision of the statute which declares that, before the plaintiff can be deprived of his title by an adverse occupation, the party in possession must "pay all the taxes, state, county, or municipal, which have been levied and assessed upon such lands." Defendant's occupation dates from 1881, and the court found as a fact that the land in controversy was assessed to him, and the taxes thereon paid by him, every year from the date of its occupation down to and including the year 1887. The court also found that the same land was assessed to plaintiff for the years 1885, 1886, and 1887, and the taxes paid by him for those years.

As an element entering into the creation of defendant's title, the payment of all taxes levied upon the land during the five years' term of occupation is necessary, but it was never intended by the lawmaking power that he should pay the taxes for any stated year more than once. Having had the land assessed to him, and having paid the taxes levied thereon, we think he has fulfilled the conditions of the statute, and that it is immaterial as to the number of times the land may have been assessed to, and the taxes paid by, other parties. If it had been intended by the legislature, in enacting this provision of the statute, that no title by adverse possession could be created against the true owner as long as he paid the taxes upon the land, it was very easy for that body to have so provided. But the provision is not so worded. It does not require the owner to do anything, but requires the claimant, in order to secure the benefit of the statute of limitations, to do something, namely, to pay the taxes upon the land. Illinois has a provision of law quite similar to the one under present investigation, and it is there held (Bolden v. Sherman, 101 Ill. 489) that, in case of double payment of the taxes for any one year, priority of payment prevails. That court has also held that the statute of limitations begins to run from the date of the payment of the taxes, and not from the date of the possession or occupation. But in Brown v. Clark, 89 Cal. 196, 26 Pac. Rep. 801, this court declined to follow that rule, and neither are we, in the present case, willing to hold that priority of payment by the true owner of itself nullifies the time which has actually run, and starts anew the statute. We see no great necessity for the enactment of the provision in the first instance. If for the purpose of giving notice to the true owner that, perchance, an adverse claimant has appeared upon the scene, his payment of the taxes as notice of that fact is entirely insignificant when compared to the circumstance of his open and notorious possession of the land. Whatever may be the object and purpose of the law, it should receive a reasonable construction, and to hold that priority of payment by the true owner of itself defeats the occupant's plea of the statute of limitations would be an unreasonable construction. If such were the law, upon the first day that taxes became due and payable it would result in a scramble at, or a race to, the tax collector's office by the respective parties to secure priority of payment. The destruction of old titles and the creation of new ones would thus be dependent upon the strongest man or fleetest horse. We do not think the provision should be so strictly construed against the adverse claimant as the foregoing illustrations would suggest. Even if the collector should arbitrarily refuse to receive the taxes from the party in possession, if properly tendered, we do not think his title would be jeopardized by his failure to make the payment. There is reason in the law, and impossible things are not demanded. In the present case the court has found that the taxes were paid by defendant. This satisfies the statute, and it is ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

I concur: BEATTY, C. J.

HARRISON, J., (concurring.) State and county taxes can be assessed upon the same property but once for the same fiscal year. "Nothing in this Code shall be construed to require or permit double taxation." Pol. Code, § 3607. The assessment which forms the basis of the taxes must be upon the property, and the assessor "must assess such property to the persons by whom it was owned or claimed, or in whose possession or control it was, at 12 o'clock M. of the first Monday of March next preceding; but no mistake in the name of the owner or supposed owner of real property shall render the assessment thereof invalid." Section 3628. There is no authority for making more than one assessment upon the same parcel of land, even though different claimants may return it to the assessor in their lists. "Lands once described on the assessment book need not be described a second time, but any person claiming the same, and desiring to be assessed therefor, may have his name inserted with that of the person to whom such land is assessed." Section 3657. When the taxes upon a parcel of land have been once paid the burden is removed, and there no longer remains any tax to be paid. Such payment may be made by any person claiming an interest in the land, and the effect of such payment will be to discharge the land from the burden of the tax, and, as there is thereafter no obligation upon any one to pay the tax, no right can be acquired by making a payment of the amount of the tax to the tax collector.

Section 325, Code Civil Proc., requires that one who seeks or claims to obtain title by adverse possession shall have paid "all the taxes, state, county or municipal, which have been levied and assessed upon such land during the five years of his adverse occupancy." If, when he offers to make a payment to the tax collector, the tax which has been levied has been already paid, he cannot comply with one of the requirements of the statute, and must fail to acquire a title by adverse possession. There is no hardship in this construction. If the owner of the land pays the taxes as they fall due, there is no reason why his title should be impaired by a subsequent payment by another. The statute makes the payment of taxes as important an element as actual occupancy of the land for the purpose of gaining a title by adverse possession, and the burden is upon the claimant to do the acts required to create the adverse title. He should be as vigilant in paying the taxes as in holding possession of the land. He is seeking to gain the title of another through statutory authority, and it is for him to see that he does all of the acts which the statute requires. In the present case the court finds that each party paid the taxes on the land for a portion of the period required to create an adverse possession. The evidence is not before us, so that we can determine therefrom which payment was first in time; but, as the court rendered its judgment in favor of the defendant, we are at liberty to assume that the evidence upon which it made its findings showed that the payment by the defendant was prior to that made by the plaintiff. It was incumbent upon the appellant to show that any error was committed by the court in rendering its judgment, and if there is any ambiguity in the findings they are to receive that construction which will sustain, rather than defeat, the judgment. I therefore concur in affirming the judgment.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. CITY BANK.
(No. 19,090.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — DEPOSIT OF CITY FUNDS—AGREEMENT WITH BANK—RECOVERY OF INTEREST.

Plaintiff, the city of Los Angeles, in pursuance of section 44 of its charter, (Act Jan. 31, 1889,) authorizing the deposit of the city funds in such bank as would agree to pay the highest rate of interest, appointed defendant bank the city depository for the ensuing year, and deposited the city funds therewith. Before the expiration of the year, the state supreme court decided that said section of the charter was void, and thereupon plaintiff withdrew from defendant the amount deposited by it. Held, in an action for the interest accrued on such deposit, that since under the previous decision, the contract for the payment of interest was void, and the making of it constituted a felony, plaintiff could not recover thereunder.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by the city of Los Angeles against the City Bank to recover interest on money deposited by plaintiff with defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Burnett & Gibbon, for appellant. C. McFarland, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. The forty-fourth section of the city charter of the city of Los Angeles provided a mode by which the funds of the city should be deposited in such bank of deposit of the city as would pay the highest rate of interest thereon, etc. St. 1889, p. 467. Pursuant to such section of the charter a contract was, after due notice, on the 10th day of March, 1890, entered into by and between the plaintiff and defendant, by which the former appointed the latter the depository of the public money of said city for the term of one year from the date of the agreement. The city agreed that the city treasurer should deposit with the bank defendant the public moneys then on hand, and all that should come to his hands during the term. Defendant agreed to pay interest on the deposit at the rate of three-eighths of one per cent. per month; interest to be paid monthly, and to be computed on daily balances. The contract was executed by the mayor on behalf of the city, and by the defendant. On the same day a city ordinance was duly passed by the council, and approved by the mayor, appointing the bank the depository of the public funds, and directing the treasurer to deposit the same accordingly. The public moneys were thereupon deposited with defendant until the interest thereon amounted to $9,721.54, according to the contract. Before the expiration of the year, section 44 of the city charter was, in the case of Yarnell v. City of Los Angeles, 87 Cal. 603, 25 Pac. Rep. 767, decided unconstitutional and void by this court. Thereupon the money was withdrawn from the bank, except the accrued interest, which was not paid, although afterwards demanded. The defendant is a commercial bank, engaged in the transaction of a general banking business, and receives money upon deposit, upon which it pays no interest, except in special cases, and upon specific contracts therefor. The cause was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, written findings filed, and judgment entered thereon in favor of plaintiff for $9,721.54, and interest thereon from April 24, 1891, at 7 per cent. per annum, amounting in the aggregate to $10,165.74. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The complaint contained three causes of action,—one upon the special contract, a second upon an account stated, and the third for money had and received by defendant to plaintiff's use. A demurrer was interposed by defendant to each of the causes of action, and sustained as to the first, and overruled as to the other two. The findings negative the right of plaintiff to recover upon the account stated, and the judgment is based upon the count for money had and received to the use of plaintiff. The question as to whether or not there was an account stated between the parties, upon which respondent has dwelt in the brief on file, need not be considered. That question is foreclosed by the action of the court below, which found against respondent on that point, and from which no appeal has been taken. The real question involved may be stated thus: (1) Plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract, which they in fact deemed valid, but which was illegal. (2) By that contract, defendant was to receive the public moneys, and pay interest thereon, for one year. (3) At the end of 10 months, plaintiff, on discovery of the illegality of the contract, demanded and received all the moneys deposited, but without any interest. (4) Can plaintiff, under such circumstances, recover the interest, in an action for money had and received?

A special agreement to pay interest gives a right of action to recover the interest whenever, under the contract, it becomes due. It is a part of the contract, and may be enforced either separately, or in connection with other obligations of the same contract; but, when it is not specially contracted for, it is but an incident of the contract or obligation upon which it depends, and cannot be recovered in a separate action after payment of the principal. In such cases, except as provided by statute, it is recovered, not as interest eo nomine, but as damages for the detention of the principal debt, or for failure to discharge the obligation. Bible Soc. v. Wells, 68 Me. 572. In that case it was said: "If, by the terms of a contract or a bequest, a party is entitled to interest, undoubtedly an action may be maintained to recover it, even after the principal has been paid. But when the contract or bequest is silent as to interest, so that, if it can be recovered at all, it can only be recovered as damages, an action to recover it cannot be maintained after payment of the principal." In Tillotson v. Preston, 3 Johns. 229, it was said, in a case where interest was not specially contracted for, that, "if the plaintiff has accepted the principal, he cannot afterwards bring an action for the interest." Seag. Dam. (8th Ed.) § 338; Fake v. Addy, 15 Wend. 76; Southern Cent. R. Co. v. Town of Moravia, 61 Barb. 180; Tenth Nat. Bank v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 4 Hun, 429. Wherever the question of the application of payments is left in doubt, the law will apply them first to the extinguishment of interest due at the date of payment, and the rule we have mentioned has no application. In the present instance, no such doubt arises. It was stipulated at the trial that the first cause of action in the complaint states correctly the history of the transaction between the city and the City Bank, but defendant objected to its relevancy. The objection was overruled, and the statement admitted in evidence. That statement is, in part, as follows: "That there is now due said city of Los Angeles, from said defendant, the City Bank, for interest upon the public moneys deposited with said bank as aforesaid, the sum of $9,721.54," etc. Again, M. D. Johnson, the city treasurer, as a witness on behalf of plaintiff, testified as follows: "Witness received every cent that was claimed to be due the city, except these items of interest;" and, further, "at the time the witness withdrew all the money except the interest, the city had no claim against the City Bank for anything except the interest that had accrued under the terms of that contract." There is other testimony in the record of like import, from all of which we think it clear that defendant paid and plaintiff received, as such, the entire amount of the principal sum deposited with it, and that the balance due, if any, was on account of the accrued interest, which, as we have attempted to show, cannot be recovered. We have spoken of the rule in reference to interest as defined by the courts, independent of statutory provisions. Civil Code, § 3290, would seem to apply a similar doctrine to express contracts for the payment of interest with that applied to implied contracts. It reads as follows: "Accepting payment of the whole principal, as such, waives all claim to interest." But was any interest due? That the attempted contract was void, is conceded on all hands. The case, then, stands thus: Plaintiff, without any contract for interest, deposited with defendant, a commercial bank, (which, as was well known, received general deposits, but did not, in the absence of a special contract, pay interest thereon,) certain money, which, upon demand, was returned to it. Under such circumstances, no implied agreement to pay interest can be evolved from the transaction. If it be contended that the law provides for interest, and that such law, in every case, becomes a part of the contract, whether express or implied, the answer must be that, in the absence of an express contract, the law only awards interest upon money from the time it falls due. Civil Code, § 1917. It is given "on moneys received to the use of another and detained from him." In the present instance the money was not due until demanded. It was not detained from plaintiff, for the reason that, upon demand, it was paid over. The position of plaintiff is ingenious, but analyzed, it amounts to this: Plaintiff deposited money with defendant under a contract for the payment of interest by the latter, and providing that the deposits should continue to be made, and to include all the public moneys, for the space of one year. At the end of, say, 10 months, it violated the contract, by ceasing to so deposit, and withdrew all funds on deposit.

Had the contract been valid, and an entire contract, plaintiff could not have recovered under it at all. If a divisible contract, plaintiff could have recovered as to the portion completed, and separable from the part violated, subject to a recoupment by defendant to the extent of the damages suffered by the violation. But the contract was void. Plaintiff had no right to make it. To do so was a violation of the constitution and general law. It was a felony. Yarnell v. City of Los Angeles, 87 Cal. 603, 25 Pac. Rep. 767; Pen. Code, § 424. Hence, plaintiff is in a better position than it would have been,

had the contract been valid. And we are, in effect, asked to hold that the law will presume a contract to pay interest, where to have agreed directly to do so would be a felony. We say "in effect," because it is apparent that it is the interest which is sought to be recovered, and to call it profits does not alter the principle. It is submitted that an agreement to pay interest on a contract will not be implied, where the parties could not, by a special contract, have provided therefor. Plaintiff was not entitled to recover the money loaned to or deposited with the defendant, by reason of the special contract, but independent of it. Its right to recover the money, in such a case, is founded upon the equitable principle that defendant has money of the plaintiff, which it would be unjust for him to retain, and hence may be required to return; and usually, in such cases, the void contract cuts no figure. So long as the void contract is executory, either party thereto, having paid money on account thereof, may recover it back. If the defendant refuses to return money so paid, on demand, he will be liable for interest from the date of his refusal, or, in a proper case, may be converted into an involuntary trustee, and held for profits. There is a wide distinction between that class of contracts which are unlawful in the sense that the law will not enforce them, and which we usually term "void contracts," and that other class which are designated as "illegal contracts." Wharton, in discussing this distinction, at section 336 of his work on Contracts, says: "A void contract is to be distinguished in this respect from an illegal contract. Money paid in furtherance of an illegal contract cannot be recovered back. But it is otherwise as to money paid in furtherance of a contract which by statute is void, but not illegal, as is the case of contracts void under the statute of frauds. An illegal contract may be repudiated by either party." Again, it is said at section 340: "No court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action upon an immoral or illegal act. If from plaintiff's own stating, or otherwise, the cause of action appears to arise ex turpi causa, or the transgression of a positive law of this country, there the court says he has no right to be assisted. It is upon that ground the court goes, not for the sake of the defendant, but because they will not lend their aid to such a plaintiff." And at section 741 it is said: "As we have already seen, money which has been paid for an illegal purpose cannot be recovered back when the purpose has been put in operation. It is otherwise as to money paid on an executory illegal agreement, when the party suing is not implicated in a continuous criminal design." We have seen that, independent of the illegal contract, there is nothing in the evidence upon which to predicate a claim on the part of the plaintiff for interest. To treat the contract as in existence,—a contract which would render all the parties concerned criminals in the eyes of the law,—and to say that plaintiff can, under such circumstances, recover a profit upon the public moneys, in violation alike of the constitution and the statutes, would tend to encourage public officers to violate their duty. Nor can the contract serve as a shield to earn illicit gains, and then be repudiated for the purpose of recovering them by an action for money had and received. To permit this would be, in effect, to enforce the illegal transaction. Neither law nor equity, in such a case, converts the defendant into an involuntary trustee, or does more than to say that a plaintiff thus situated can gain no profit by an open and palpable violation of the law. The exceptions to this rule arise in cases where the parties are not in pari delicto, or where one of the parties is the victim of duress or fraud, or superior influence, and have no application to the case at bar. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the court below directed to dismiss the action.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

RHOTON et al. v. BLEVIN. (No. 18,126.)

WILLS — CONSTRUCTION — INTENTIONAL OMISSION OF GRANDCHILDREN.

A will reciting that testator, knowing that his wife would ever continue the same kind, devoted mother to their children which she had always proven herself, gave all his property to his wife, expressly excluding said children. Held, that an intentional omission to provide for issue of deceased children appeared on the face of the will, within Civil Code, § 1307, providing that in case of an omission to provide for any child or the issue of a deceased child, unless it appears that such omission was intentional, he shall take as though there had been no will.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sutter county; John C. Gray, Judge.

Action by Ida Rhoton and others, by R. E. Robinson, guardian ad litem, against Ona Blevin, executrix. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. H. Cramdock, for appellant. R. E. Robinson, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought by Ida Rhoton and Elenora Rhoton, minor children of Amanda Rhoton, deceased, and Marion Sitton, a minor child of Eliza Sitton, deceased, to construe the last will of William T. Blevin, deceased. William T. Blevin, deceased, was a resident of the county of Sutter, and on the 28th day of April, A. D. 1888, made, executed, and published his last will and testament, in which the following language is used: "First. Knowing that my beloved wife, Ona Blevin, will ever continue the same kind, devoted mother to our children which she has so thoroughly proven herself on all occasions, I make no provisions for said children further than herein mentioned, but I grant, give, and bequeath to my said beloved wife, Ona Blevin, all and singular the property, real, personal, and mixed, wheresoever situated, and all moneys, goods, and chattels of whatsoever name, nature, or description, belonging to me, of which I may die possessed, or to the possession of which I may be in any manner entitled. In thus bequeathing all my estate to my wife to the exclusion of all my children I am moved by no want of paternal affection for any of said children, but by the belief that their own interests will be better served thereby, and well knowing that my wife will make the best use and disposition of the estate which her industry has largely contributed to acquire." The testator then proceeds to appoint his wife, Ona Blevin, as the sole executrix of the will, to act as such without giving bonds or security, and confers upon her power and authority to lease, sell, and dispose of all the property, real or personal, absolutely, without applying to any court for permission so to do, and generally confers upon her all the powers necessary and requisite to dispose of the property, pay his debts, etc.

At the time of making said will, and on the 9th day of January, 1889, at which time the said William T. Blevin departed this life at Sutter county, Cal., he left surviving him as his next of kin and heirs at law, beside Ona Blevin, his wife, four children of full age, and the plaintiffs herein, who were his grandchildren, and the children, respectively, of Amanda Rhoton and Eliza Sitton aforesaid, deceased, daughters of the said William T. Blevin and one Ona Blevin. The will is set out in full in the complaint, to which complaint the defendant demurred upon the grounds (1) that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against defendant; (2) that it appears from the copy of the will set out in the petition that testator did not omit to provide in his will for the petitioners herein, being the issue of his deceased children; (3) that, if the testator omitted to provide for petitioners herein as the issue of his deceased children, it further appears from said will that such omission was intentional on the part of said testator. The demurrer was overruled by the court, and, defendant declining to answer, a judgment was entered, in which it was decreed and determined that the petitioners or plaintiffs herein are heirs of said William T. Blevin, deceased, and as such are entitled to succeed to the same shares of the estate of the said deceased as they would have succeeded to had he died intestate, viz. the said Ida Rhoton and the said Elenora Rhoton to an undivided one eighteenth (1-18) interest or share each in said estate; and the said Marion Sitton an undivided one-ninth (1-9) interest or share in said estate; and that, upon a final settlement and distribution of the residue of said estate, they receive their shares or proportions thereof accordingly.

The contention of respondents is that, being grandchildren of the testator, William T. Blevin, whose parents are not living, and the testator having failed in his will to make any provision for them, and that it failing to appear that such omission was intentional, they are entitled, under section 1307 of the Civil Code, to the same share or interest in his estate as if he had died intestate. Section 1307 is as follows: "When any testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children, or for the issue of any deceased child, unless it appears that such omission was intentional, said child or the issue of such child must have the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate, and succeeds thereto as provided in the preceding section." It will be perceived from the foregoing section that a child or children, and the issue of any deceased child or children, are placed in the same category so far that if omitted to be provided for in the will they are entitled to a share in the estate as though no will had been made, unless it appears that such omission was intentional. We must look to the face of the will itself to determine the question whether or not the petitioners were intentionally omitted therefrom by the testator. The correct rule is said to be that the words of the will must show that the testator had the person omitted in his mind, and, having him so in his mind, has omitted him from the provisions of his will. In re Estate of Garraud, 35 Cal. 339; Estate of Stevens, 83 Cal. 322, 23 Pac. Rep. 379, and cases there cited. "A will is to be construed according to the intention of the testator. Where his intention cannot have effect to its full extent it must have effect as far as possible." Civil Code, § 1317. Again: "The words of a will are to receive an interpretation which will give to every expression some effect, rather than one which will render any of the expressions inoperative." Id. § 1325. The intention of the testator in this instance to bequeath and devise all his property to his wife is about as clearly apparent as language could render it. Having full faith in his wife, and satisfied that she would "ever continue the same kind, devoted mother to our children which she has so thoroughly proven herself on all occasions," he makes no provision for said children, but proceeds to devise all his property to his said wife, and then again declares that he is not moved to this action by want of paternal affection, but by the belief that the interests of the children will be best subserved by this course. Having thus photographed his intention to exclude all his children, and given satisfactory reasons therefor, reasons which apply as clearly to the children of his deceased daughters, his grandchildren, as to his immediate children, we are satisfied that a construction which eliminates from the class of those proscribed his grandchildren, however grammatical the construction may be, violates the clear intention of the testator, which was to use the word "children" in an enlarged sense, including alike children and grandchildren, and at the same time violates the principle of interpretation which requires effect to be given to every expression in a will. We do not doubt but that the terms "children," "grandchildren," "nephew," "niece," "cousin," or any similar term, must ordinarily be presumed to have been used in its primary and natural sense, and that this sense cannot be enlarged or qualified, unless there be something on the face of the will clearly indicating such intent in the mind of the testator at the time of making the will. In gathering this intent of the testator, the necessity of enlarging or modifying terms of this character, in order to give effect and operation to the will, is a consideration not to be overlooked. The only question here is, did the testator intentionally omit to provide in the will for the issue of his deceased children, and does that intention appear upon the face of the the will? We think the will, taken together, shows that the term "children" was used in that enlarged sense which includes descendants of the second as well as of the first degree, and that the grandchildren, who are plaintiffs here, are precluded by the will from any share in the estate. Estate of Schedel, 73 Cal. 594, 15 Pac. Rep. 297. It follows that the judgment of the court below should be reversed, and the court directed to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the court below directed to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

PEOPLE v. LARSEN. (No. 20,991.)

ROBBERY—EVIDENCE OF ACCOMPLICE—CORROBORATION.

Where the only evidence to convict defendant of a robbery is that of an accomplice, who testifies that defendant planned the robbery, and received part of the proceeds, and that of two witnesses, that they had seen defendant and the accomplice together on two occasions before the robbery, there is no such corroboration of the evidence of the accomplice, as required by Pen. Code, § 1111, as to justify conviction.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; S. A. Holmes, Judge.

Albert Larsen was convicted of robbery, and appeals. Reversed.

Frank H. Short and G. C. Freeman, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

VANCLIEF, C. The defendant and George Green were, by information, jointly accused of the crime of robbery. They demanded separate trials, and upon the separate trial of the defendant the jury returned a verdict of guilty, recommending defendant to the mercy of the court. Thereupon the court sentenced him to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of 40 years. He appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The principal point upon which appellant relies for a reversal of the judgment is that the only evidence tending to connect him with the commission of the crime was the testimony of an accomplice,—one Cliff Ragan,—whose testimony was not corroborated as required by section 1111 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows: "A conviction cannot be had on the testimony of an accomplice, unless he is corroborated by other evidence, which in itself, and without aid of the testimony of the accomplice, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, or the circumstances thereof." It appears that the robbery was committed at a store owned by a Chinaman named Sun Kee, about 7 o'clock in the evening of April 27, 1892. Sun Kee was absent at the time, and the store was in charge of a Chinaman named You Kam, with whom was another Chinaman, named Wong Yee. Another Chinaman, named Wong Ki, was at his cabin somewhere near the store. The three Chinamen last named testified to the effect that they had known the defendant two or three years; that he lived three or four miles from China store; that he came to the store on horseback about 15 minutes before 7 o'clock on the evening of the robbery, while You Kam and Wong Yee were at supper, and told them that he wanted to purchase certain articles from the store; that You Kam knew he had traded at the store before, and had an unsettled account there. Thereupon the two Chinamen, You Kam and Wong Yee, went with defendant from the kitchen, where they had been eating, into the store, carrying a lighted lamp with them; You Kam going behind the counter, and Wong Yee taking a seat in front of the counter. While they were in this position, two robbers armed with a pistol and a rifle,—one of them masked,—rushed in. The masked robber, pointing his pistol at defendant and Wong Yee, drove them into a corner; and the other pointed his rifle at You Kam, who ducked under the counter. The masked robber then backed out of the door, and shot through the window at You Kam, inflicting a slight flesh wound on one of his arms. Upon being thus wounded, You Kam fell upon the floor, feigning to be dead, and did not arise until after the robbers left. Immediately after the shot was fired, both robbers tied the defendant and Wong Yee together, and one robber guarded them with a drawn pistol while the other searched the house for money and other portable things of value. This done, they led defendant and Wong Yee out to a barn, where they left them still tied together, and departed. Soon after the robbers left, You Kam untied defendant and Wong Yee. After being untied, defendant remained at the store about three-quarters of an hour, and then left for his home. The robber who was not masked was recognized by the Chinamen as George Green, who was accused of the crime jointly with the defendant, and had been separately tried before the trial of the defendant, but the masked robber was not recognized by any of the Chinamen. The foregoing is the sum and substance of the testimony of the three Chinamen; and there was no other witness to the fact of the robbery, except Cliff Ragan, who testified that he was the masked robber; that Green had a mask on, but it fell off; the robbery had been planned and concocted by defendant, George Green, and himself a week or two before it was committed; that the part enacted by defendant at the robbery was in accordance with their plan; and that the proceeds of the robbery were divided between defendant, Green, and himself. It appears that, at the time of the trial of the defendant, Ragan was in jail on a separate charge of having participated in this robbery, and also on a charge of an assault to murder, and on the trial of defendant he testified that he had served one term in the state prison for a felony, of which he was convicted in 1888; that his reason for confessing his guilt of the crime of robbery in this case was to get through with it, and get off lighter, if he could; that the district attorney had told him that it would be easier on him if he told all he knew about it, and he might get off with two or three years, though the district attorney said he had no control over the amount of the punishment, which depended entirely upon the court. Darwin Lewis testified that he had seen defendant, Green, and Ragan together in defendant's corral, near his house, about a week or 15 days before the robbery, where they were castrating colts. William Downey testified that, about noon on the day of the robbery, he saw defendant and George Green in the town of Raymond, some two or three miles from the residence of defendant,—first saw them tying their horses in front of his store; did not know they came together; Green came into witness' store and bought some cartridges; defendant did not enter his store. James Downey saw Green in Raymond in the afternoon of the same day, but does not say he saw defendant on that day. The foregoing is the substance of all the evidence on the part of the prosecution, and no evidence was introduced by defendant.

We think that, without aid from the testimony of Ragan, the other evidence did not tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the robbery, and therefore did not sufficiently corroborate the accomplice. People v. Thompson, 50 Cal. 480; People v. Ames, 39 Cal. 403. No brief appears to have been filed on the part of the people in this case, but we understand that the attorney general submitted this case on his brief in the case of People v. Green, 34 Pac. Rep. 231. We have examined that brief, but find in it no attempt to answer the point above considered. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

KLAUBER et al. v. SAN DIEGO STREET-CAR CO. (No. 19,189.)

APPEAL—REVERSAL—RES JUDICATA.

On an appeal on the judgment roll by plaintiff from a judgment for defendant, the supreme court reversed and directed the court below to enter a judgment on the findings for plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. The court did so, and defendant excepted and appealed. Held, that the question whether the complaint stated a cause of action was decided on the former appeal, whether the demurrer was in the record or not. 32 Pac. Rep. 876, reversed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by A. Klauber and others against the San Diego Street-Car Company for specific performance. Judgment for defendant was reversed on appeal. 30 Pac. Rep. 555. Defendant appeals. Motion to dismiss denied. 32 Pac. Rep. 876. Judgment affirmed.

Gibson & Titus, for appellant. Parrish, Mossholder & Lewis and Luce & McDonald, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. In this case judgment was originally entered in the court below for defendant. An appeal was taken by the plaintiffs to this court from the judgment upon the judgment roll, and this court reversed the judgment, and directed the superior court "to enter a judgment upon the findings in favor of plaintiffs, in accordance with the prayer of the complaint." When the case went back to the superior court judgment was there entered for plaintiffs in strict pursuance of the said direction of this court. The defendant then procured the court below to settle a bill of exceptions, and upon the judgment roll, including said bill of exceptions, he now appeals to this court. Respondents moved to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the judgment of the court below, entered in accordance with the directions of this court as aforesaid, was final, but the motion to dismiss the appeal was denied in department, upon the ground that the bill of exceptions presented some questions that had not been passed upon at the former appeal. 32 Pac. Rep. 876. The main contention of appellant on this appeal is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, but that point was clearly and necessarily decided against the appellant's contention on the former appeal. It appears that the demurrer to the complaint was not included in the judgment roll as it came to this court upon the former appeal, but the appellant could easily have supplied it by a suggestion of diminution of the record; and the question of the sufficiency of the complaint to constitute a cause of action was before the court, whether the demurrer was in the record or not. The only other points made by appellant are that the findings are not sustained by the evidence, and that certain deeds were improperly admitted in evidence; but neither of those contentions can be maintained, and we see nothing in them demanding special notice. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO

Pierson & Mitchell and Horace G. Platt, for respondent.

LUCO v. DE TORO. (No. 19,229.)

APPEAL—REMAND—OBITER DICTA.

The supreme court, in its opinion reversing a case for lack of a certain and unambiguous finding on a material question of fact, added that, if the finding could be construed as in favor of respondent, it was enough to say that in the court's opinion it was not supported by the evidence. Held, that said remark was clearly obiter, and did not preclude the trial court from finding for respondent on substantially the same evidence, strengthening its conclusion by other new findings, based on the evidence, and probative of the main finding.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by Juan M. Luco against Juan de Toro for partition. The facts are recited in the opinion on the former appeal. 27 Pac. Rep. 1082. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

I. N. Thorne and Oliver P. Evans, for appellant. Smith & Winder and Works & Works, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The appellant's right of recovery depends upon the performance by Hartman of his contract with Olvera to procure the issuance of a patent for the Rancho Ex-Mission of San Diego. This agreement is set forth at length in the opinion of this court rendered upon the former appeal. 91 Cal. 405, 27 Pac. Rep. 1082. Upon that appeal the judgment of the court below was reversed for its failure to make a sufficient finding upon this issue. The finding which it had made was held to be ambiguous and uncertain, inasmuch as in one part thereof the court found that immediately after the execution of the agreement Hartman entered upon the performance of the stipulations therein contained to be performed on his part, and that, in connection with the plaintiff herein, he continued to prosecute them to a final conclusion, while in a subsequent portion of the same finding the court found that there had not been a full and complete or substantial performance of that agreement. It was also said in the opinion that the appellant "was entitled to an unequivocal finding on the question of performance." Upon the subsequent trial of the cause, from which the present appeal is taken, the court finds that "the said contract was not fully or substantially performed by the said Hartman, nor did the said Hartman procure to be issued the patent for the said rancho," and it also finds as a fact that after the case was sent on to Washington, in 1871, Hartman rendered no services, but abandoned the case. As there was evidence before the court in support of these findings, the findings themselves must be accepted in this court as forming the basis of the judgment, irrespective of any conflict or preponderance of evidence upon which they were made. It is, however, contended by the appellant that, as it was said in the opinion upon the former appeal, after determining that the finding was ambiguous and uncertain, that "if, however, the finding can be construed as a finding in favor of respondent on that subject, it is sufficient to say that in our opinion it is not supported by the evidence," and, as the evidence at the last trial was substantially the same, the opinion upon the former appeal has become the law of the case, and that the trial court should have made its finding in conformity thereto.

The determination by this court of the rights of the parties in an appeal from the superior court is a final adjudication of those rights, and the questions of law decided by this court become a rule for the guidance of the trial court as well as of this court if the same questions are again presented in that controversy upon a retrial of the issues or upon a subsequent appeal. The principle upon which this rule rests is that the judgment is an estoppel binding upon the parties, and to be enforced by the court. Klauber v. Car Co., 32 Pac. Rep. 876. The rule is not limited to controverted questions of abstract law, but is equally applicable when the point determined upon the appeal is whether the evidence before the trial court was sufficient to justify a decision drawn therefrom, which confers or withholds a legal right for either party. As the principle upon which this rule rests is that of an estoppel by judgment, it follows that it is only the matters which are actually adjudged or determined as the basis of the judgment of this court that can be considered as the law of the case, and binding upon the parties in its subsequent stages, and that when the judgment or determination is made upon a certain state of facts, it ceases to be of binding force if the facts presented at the retrial or upon a subsequent appeal are essentially different. The ground upon which the former judgment of this court was rendered was the failure of the trial court to make a finding upon this issue, and the statement in the opinion that the finding which it had made was ambiguous and uncertain rendered what was subsequently said about the insufficiency of the evidence to support the construction placed upon it by the respondent in his argument merely obiter. As the court had not made a finding upon the issue, there could be no basis for this court to make a determination respecting the sufficiency of the evidence to support that finding. It has been often held that when the trial court has failed to make a finding upon an issue in the case, although the entire evidence is before this court, we have no power to make a finding therefrom, but must remand the cause to the trial court for that purpose; that the act of drawing a conclusion from the evidence is peculiarly the function of the trial court, and that this court, in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, has power to correct only errors of law, and cannot correct errors of fact committed by that court. The same principles preclude any opinion which this court may give upon the character of the finding which should be drawn from the evidence in a case from having any binding force upon the trial court to which the case should be remanded, or in the determination of any subsequent appeal. See Wixson v. Devine, 80 Cal. 385, 22 Pac. Rep. 224.

The record, as presented upon this appeal, contains findings of certain facts which were not made at the former trial, and which, of course, could not have been considered by this court on the former appeal. In addition to finding that the contract was not fully or substantially performed by Hartman, the court also finds that, while he did render some services in the surveyor general's office in this state, yet after the case was sent to Washington, in the early part of the year 1871, "no further services were performed by the said Hartman, nor did he appear in the said proceeding before the commissioner of the land office or secretary of the interior, but the case was wholly abandoned by him;" and also that the employment of Denver by Olvera was after the abandonment of the case by Hartman, and that the patent was procured to be issued by Denver. The evidence before the court was ample to sustain findings, and as probative of these facts they are controlling in support of the ultimate fact found upon the issue of performance. It follows that the judgment and order must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: FITZGERALD, J.; McFARLAND, J.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment.

LOS ANGELES FARMING & MILLING CO. v. HOFF et al. (No. 19,180.)

PUBLIC LANDS—INCLOSURE—COLOR OF TITLE.

A judicial decree, followed by possession under a bona fide claim, is color of title, within the meaning of Act Cong. Feb. 25, 1885, prohibiting inclosures of public lands unless under "claim or color of title made or acquired in good faith," and, such possession having lasted for 25 years, the holder can maintain ejectment against persons assuming to enter on the premises as being "public lands of the United States." Cameron v. U. S., 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 595, 148 U. S. 301, followed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Ejectment by the Los Angeles Farming & Milling Company against Hoff and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. M. Dameron, for appellants. Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland and Stephen M. White, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action of ejectment brought against the defendant Hoff and over 100 others, to recover possession of the south half of the San Fernando rancho in Los Angeles county. Upon the facts shown at the trial we think there can be no question as to the right of the plaintiff to recover in this action, and the question of error in the instructions becomes immaterial. The supreme court of the United States, in a recent decision, has construed the act of congress of February 25, 1885, and in effect answered every proposition upon which the appellants rely herein. Cameron v. U. S., 148 U. S. 301, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 395. The plaintiff has been in the possession, under sanction of a judicial decree, for about 25 years. Its claim has been made in good faith and under color of title, while the defendants are mere naked trespassers. The case comes squarely, therefore, within the decision above referred to, and requires no further consideration. See, also, U. S. v. Brandestein, 32 Fed. Rep. 740, and Rourke v. McNally, (Cal.) 33 Pac. Rep. 62. We find no error in the record. Judgment and order affirmed.

Ex parte CARROLL. (No. 21,048.)

CONTEMPT—COMMITTING OFFICER OF COURT—VALIDITY OF JUDGMENT.

A commitment for contempt of court, in disobeying an order requiring the person committed to restore to the administrator of an estate in process of settlement money which he had obtained, as attorney for such administrator, by false pretenses, is void, where the judgment on which the commitment issued fails to show that he was in fact such attorney.

In chambers. Petition in habeas corpus by John S. Carroll for the release of John F. Burris from custody on a commitment for contempt. Petition granted.

John S. Carroll, in pro. per.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a proceeding upon habeas corpus instituted by the petitioner, Carroll, on behalf of John F. Burris, who is alleged to be unlawfully restrained of his liberty. The return to the writ consists of nothing more than the commitment under which the prisoner is held, which recites certain proceedings on attachment for an alleged contempt of court. These recitals show that Burris obtained from the administratrix of an estate in progress of settlement in the superior court the sum of $108 by false pretenses; that he was ordered by the court to restore the money, and, failing to do so, was committed to the custody of the sheriff, to be confined in jail until he obeyed the order. The authority of the court to make such an order is rested upon the suggestion that Burris was attorney for the administratrix, and obtained the money from her by abuse of his privileges as an officer of court. It may be that a court has the power to make such an order, and enforce it against an attorney by process of contempt, but there is nothing in the return to show that Burris was an attorney for the administratrix at the time he obtained the money in question, and therefore the order appears to be void. Leave has been asked, since the hearing and submission of the case, to amend the return by showing that the complaint in the contempt proceeding alleged that Burris was attorney for the administratrix. But, even if it were proper to allow such amendment at this time, it would not cure the defect, for the judgment of the court—copied in the commitment—nowhere finds that Burris was such attorney. It speaks of him merely as one John F. Burris, i. e. as an entire stranger to the probate proceedings, and as much beyond the jurisdiction of the superior court in attachment for contempt as any other stranger. In contempt cases the facts necessary to confer jurisdiction should not only be alleged, but found, and here they are not found in any form, specific or general. The prisoner is discharged.

OVERALL v. TULARE COUNTY. (No. 18,116.)

SHERIFF — MILEAGE — UNSUCCESSFUL PURSUIT OF ESCAPED PRISONERS—SEVERAL ARRESTS AT SAME TIME.

1. Act March 5, 1870, (St. 1869-70, p. 159,) § 9, relating to sheriff's fees, provides that the sheriff is entitled to receive, "for every mile necessarily traveled in going only, in executing any warrant of arrest, * * * or for mileage in any criminal case or proceeding, * * * thirty cents." St. 1887, p. 207, § 211, provides that the fees provided in the act shall be in full compensation, "provided further, that the board of supervisors shall allow to the sheriff his necessary expenses for pursuing criminals or transacting any criminal business without the boundaries of his county." Held, that the sheriff was not entitled to mileage while unsuccessfully hunting for escaped prisoners for whose arrest he had warrants. Broughton v. County of Santa Barbara, 3 Pac. Rep. 877, 65 Cal. 257, followed.

2. Where a sheriff arrests two or more persons at the same time he is not entitled to one mileage at such statutory rate for each person arrested.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; Wheaton A. Gray, Judge.

Action by D. G. Overall against Tulare county to recover for certain fees claimed to be due him as sheriff of such county. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Bradley & Farnsworth, for appellant. Chas. G. Lamberson and W. W. Middlecoff, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff was sheriff of Tulare county from January 7, 1889, until January 5, 1891. During that time no salary was attached to his office, but he was entitled to charge and receive for official services such fees as were allowed by law. On November 29, 1890, he presented to the board of supervisors for allowance a claim against the county for $770.40. Of this claim $284.70 was for "miles traveled hunting for" one

McFarlane, and $485.30 for "miles traveled in hunting for" one McKinney, both of whom had been charged with the commission of crime. On January 12, 1891, the board allowed and ordered paid $201 on this claim. On January 30, 1891, plaintiff presented to the board of supervisors for allowance another claim against the county for $690.50. This claim was for services in traveling to places away from the county seat, and arresting and bringing before justices of the peace a large number of alleged criminal offenders. On March 5, 1891, the board allowed and ordered paid $461.50 on this claim. Plaintiff was not satisfied with the amounts so allowed, and refused to accept the same, and thereupon he commenced this action to recover the full amount of his two claims, setting out a separate cause of action upon each claim. Attached to the complaint are copies of the claims presented to the board, duly itemized, and marked respectively "Exhibit A" and "Exhibit B." The gist of the first cause of action is stated in the complaint as follows: "That between the 26th day of November, 1889, and the 1st day of February, 1890, the plaintiff, as such sheriff, necessarily traveled 2,568 miles within said state in executing warrants in criminal cases; and that thereby said defendant became, and still is, justly indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $770.40, no part of which has been paid." And the gist of the second cause of action is thus stated: "That between the 10th day of November, 1890, and the 5th day of January, 1891, defendant became, and still is, justly indebted to plaintiff for services performed as such sheriff, for mileage necessarily traveled, and for serving subpoenas and warrants in criminal cases to the amount of $689.50, no part of which has been paid." The answer denied all the material averments of the complaint, and upon the issues thus raised the case was tried by the court without a jury. The court found that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the full amount claimed, less the sum of $27.60, which had been twice charged in "Exhibit B." Judgment was accordingly entered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,432.30 and costs of suit. From this judgment, and an order denying its motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The law fixing the traveling fees of the sheriff of Tulare county during the time plaintiff held that office, is found in section 9 of the act of March 5, 1870, (St. 1869-70, p. 159, and see St. 1877-78, p. 559.) The provision is as follows: "For every mile necessarily traveled in going only, in executing any warrant of arrest, subpoena, or venire, bringing up a prisoner on habeas corpus, taking prisoners before a magistrate or to prison, or for mileage in any criminal case or proceeding; provided, that in serving a subpoena or venire, when two or more jurors or witnesses live in the same direction, but one mileage shall be charged, thirty cents." And the county government act provides: "The salaries and fees provided in this act shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers therein named, * * * provided further, that the board of supervisors shall allow to the sheriff his necessary expenses for pursuing criminals or transacting any criminal business without the boundaries of his county." St. 1887, p. 207, § 211. In support of the first cause of action it was shown that McFarlane and McKinney were in the county jail, and escaped therefrom during the night of November 25 or 26, 1889. On the morning of the 27th plaintiff started out hunting for them, having warrants for their arrest, and continued such hunting until December 14th. While so engaged he traveled 940 miles, most of which traveling was outside of his county. After December 14th plaintiff discontinued his hunting until January 9, 1890, when he started out again in quest of McKinney, and arrested him in Rawlins, Wyo. In going and returning on this last trip he traveled 670 miles within this state. Subsequently, in December, 1890, plaintiff started out again after McFarlane, and found and arrested him in the town of San Marcial in New Mexico. For this last service he afterwards presented another claim against the county, and it was allowed and paid in full. The 949 miles and 670 miles traveled as before stated, the first number, however, being duplicated, because the hunting was for two alleged criminals at the same time, constitute the plaintiff's claim as set forth in his "Exhibit A;" and the only question is, was he entitled to a larger allowance on it than was made by the board of supervisors? Plaintiff testified: "During the time I did this traveling, hunting for McKinney from and including November 27, 1889, to December 14, 1889, I did not arrest McKinney or have him in my custody. These places where I traveled in hunting were several hundred miles from where I finally arrested McKinney. Between the 14th day of December, 1889, and January 9, 1890, I did not do any traveling in hunting for McKinney. It was nearly a month after I did this traveling in hunting for McKinney before I arrested him; nearly a month before I started out again to hunt him. * * * I arrested McFarlane some time in December, 1890. I arrested him several hundred miles from the place where I did the hunting for him as set forth in my complaint in 'Exhibit A.' * * * I arrested both McFarlane and McKinney in opposite directions from the places where I traveled in hunting for them as set forth in my claim marked 'Exhibit A;' not exactly opposite, but in a different direction. The arrest of McFarlane by me was made nearly a year after the time I traveled hunting for him, as set out in my claim marked 'Exhibit A.'" It will be observed that the plaintiff was allowed by the supervisors all that he was entitled to claim under the statute for the 670 miles traveled in making the arrest of McKinney, and also all that he claimed for making the arrest of McFarlane, and that only his claim for the miles traveled which did not result in any arrest was disallowed. In Broughton v. County of Santa Barbara, 65 Cal. 257, 3 Pac. Rep. 877, the sheriff of that county sought to recover, under section 9 of the statute of 1869-70, above quoted, a certain sum of money as "mileage" for traveling to serve a warrant of arrest on one charged with felony; and it was held that the statute did not allow mileage for traveling in different directions in looking for one charged with a crime who is not arrested. That case we consider directly in point, and decisive of the first cause of action in this. It is true that McFarlane and McKinney were subsequently found and arrested, but that fact, under the circumstances shown, does not materially distinguish this case from that. It follows that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover for the miles traveled in his unsuccessful hunt, though possibly he might have rightly claimed pay for his necessary expenses. That question, however, does not arise here, as no such claim was presented for allowance.

In support of the second cause of action it was shown that between November 10, 1889, and January 5, 1890, a deputy of the plaintiff went several times to Goshen and Tulare, and arrested at the former place 18 and at the latter 49 different persons. The arrests were all made without any warrants, and it was admitted "that the plaintiff went to Goshen without any knowledge of any crime having been committed by any of the defendants in any of the said cases, and that while at Goshen he arrested each of said defendants, and took each of said defendants to Visalia, where he swore to a complaint before the justice against each of said defendants, upon which a warrant was issued in each of said cases, which warrant was thereupon at said Visalia served by plaintiff upon each of said defendants." And there was a like admission as to the arrests made at Tulare. It was further admitted that each of the defendants named in the admissions was charged with a misdemeanor. The deputy testified: "Some of these parties were arrested for vagrancy, some for malicious mischief, and I think there were two or three for disturbing the peace. * * * At the time I arrested any of the defendants at Goshen I did not have any knowledge or notice that any particular defendant had committed any offense before I started from Visalia. In each and all of these cases the crime was committed at Goshen, after I arrived there, and was done in my presence while there. I also state that each and all the defendants whom I arrested at Tulare were arrested by me for a crime committed in my presence at Tulare. I had no notice or knowledge of any of these defendants committing a crime before I started to Tulare." The distance from Visalia to Goshen was eight miles, and to Tulare twelve miles. In making up his claim, as shown by "Exhibit B," plaintiff charged, and now insists that he is entitled to recover, mileage at the rate of 30 cents per mile from Visalia to the place of arrest, for each of the 18 and 49 persons arrested; and whether he was entitled to such mileage or not is the only question which need be considered, the allowance made by the board of supervisors being sufficient to cover all the balance of his claim. As before stated, the plaintiff was entitled to such fees only as were allowed by law. No statute or rule of law is cited authorizing such a charge as that in question, and we know of none. It seems clear, therefore, that this claim for mileage was properly disallowed by the supervisors, and improperly allowed by the court below. It follows that the judgment and order must be reversed, and the cause remanded. So ordered.

In re PINGREE'S ESTATE. (No. 18,186.)

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR—RIGHT TO LETTERS.

A public administrator does not, by filing his petition for administration on an estate before the ending of his term of office, become entitled to administer thereon as against the incumbent of the office at the time of the grant of administration.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; William O. Minor, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of W. C. Pingree, deceased. From an order refusing letters of administration to J. Phelps, and granting them to J. D. Bentley, the former appeals. Affirmed.

L. J. Maddux, for appellant. Eastin & Griffin, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. On the 30th day of December, 1892, W. C. Pingree died intestate in the county of Stanislaus, in this state. He was a resident of the county at the time of his death, and left an estate therein, consisting of real and personal property, of the value of more than $15,000. He had no relatives or heirs at law residing in this state. On December 31st, the next day after the death of Pingree, J. Phelps, then the public administrator of the county, filed in the superior court thereof his petition in proper form, asking that letters of administration on the estate of the deceased be issued to him. On January 2, 1893, J. D. Bentley became the public administrator of the county, and on the next day (January 3d) he, as such officer, filed in the superior court his petition in proper form, asking that letters of administration on the estate of the said deceased be issued to him. Due notices of the petitions were given, and they were both set for hearing at the same time, on January 14, 1893. At the time set for the hearing, Phelps was sworn as a witness, and among other things testified: "I filed my petition for letters of administration on the 31st day of December, 1892, before I had ever seen the deceased, before his burial, and before I had held the inquest on his remains. I had not at that time ever seen any of his property or taken charge of it. I had made no search for his will, except to talk with some one at Knight's Ferry through the telephone. I did not then know anything about his property. I have not taken charge of the property under an order of court, and have not had charge of it since the special letters of administration were issued to J. D. Bentley. I wrote to Mr. Means to take charge of the property, but I don't know whether he did or not. I have never been in charge of it personally. I have not been public administrator since the 3d day of January, 1893, and am not now." Other witnesses were also sworn and examined in behalf of both petitioners, and at the conclusion of the evidence the court made an order denying the petition of Phelps, and granting that of Bentley. From this order Phelps appeals, and his contention is that inasmuch as Pingree died, and he filed his petition, during his term of office, he became interested in the estate to the extent of his commissions, and was therefore entitled to administer upon it and recover the commissions, notwithstanding his term of office expired before his petition was heard; and, in support of this position, Rogers v. Hoberlein, 11 Cal. 120, and In re Aveline's Estate, 53 Cal. 260, are cited. The Code names 10 classes of persons who may be appointed to administer on estates, and among them are public administrators. Section 1365, Code Civil Proc. It provides that petitions for letters of administration must be in writing, etc., (section 1371,) and that any person interested may contest the petition, and may assert his own rights to the administration, and pray that letters be issued to himself, (section 1374;) and also that on the hearing the court must hear the allegations and proofs of the parties, and order the issuing of letters of administration to the party best entitled thereto, (section 1375.) A public administrator, like any other person, can administer on an estate only when there has been made to him a special judicial grant of administration thereon. He does not, by virtue of his office, acquire the right to administer upon any particular estate. Beckett v. Selover, 7 Cal. 216; In re Hamilton's Estate, 34 Cal. 464. The cases cited by appellant are only to the effect that where letters of administration have been granted to a public administrator he may continue his administration of the estate after the expiration of his term of office, and until his authority is set aside or revoked by another appointment. Those cases are not in point here. The appellant did not, by virtue of his office or by filing his petition, acquire any interest in the estate of Pingree, or in the commissions to be earned by administering upon it; and when his term of office expired he ceased to be one of the persons specially named to whom letters might be granted. It was his status at the time of the grant of administration, and not at the time of filing his petition, that determined his competency. The court did not, therefore, err in ordering that letters of administration on the estate be issued to Bentley as "the party best entitled thereto." The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; SEARLS, C.

PEOPLE v. VOLCANO CANYON TOLL-ROAD CO. (No. 18,118.)

QUO WARRANTO — RESTRAINING COLLECTION OF TURNPIKE TOLLS—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action in the nature of a quo warranto, brought by the attorney general, to have a certain road declared a highway, and to enjoin defendant from collecting tolls thereon, defendant's claim and exercise of the franchise being admitted, the burden is on defendant to show by what warrant or authority such claim is made.

2. An averment in the complaint in such action, that "for more than six months last past defendant has had no franchise or right to demand or take toll," is not an admission of the existence of such franchise or right previous to that period.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Information in the nature of a quo warranto against the Volcano Canyon Toll-Road Company. From an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Clitus Barber and John M. Fulweiler, for appellant. F. P. Tuttle and A. K. Robinson, for the People.

TEMPLE, C. This action was brought to have a certain road in Placer county declared a public highway, and to enjoin defendant from collecting tolls thereon. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals from an order denying a new trial. It is averred in the complaint that defendant claims and is exercising the franchise of collecting tolls for the privilege of traveling upon and passing over the road, and is maintaining toll-gates, thereby obstructing the road, and preventing its use and enjoyment by the public, except upon condition of paying toll to the defendant; further, "that, for more than six months last past, defendant has had no franchise or right to demand or take toll from passengers or travelers upon said road for the privilege of passing over or along the same with their animals, or at all, or to establish or maintain any tollgate or other gate or obstruction thereon," etc. The answer admits, by not denying, that the defendant claims and is exercising the disputed franchise, but denies that it is doing so without right, and avers that the board of supervisors of the county granted defendant a franchise to collect tolls upon the road, which has not expired.

This being an information in the nature of a quo warranto brought by the attorney general, and the fact that the defendant claimed and was exercising the disputed franchise being admitted, the burden was on the defendant to show by what warrant or authority it claimed and exercised the franchise. There was no attempt to show any warrant or authority whatever. The judgment, therefore, was proper.

The statement shows that but one witness was sworn, and that was one Bunker, who testified for the defendant. He testified that the road belonged to his wife, who took it as legatee under the will of witness' brother, and since they had owned it they had built a bridge, and repaired the road. That toll had always been charged for traveling the road. He also said they had never claimed to be incorporated, and that the name used as defendant was simply the name of the road, and was convenient for that purpose. Yet we are referred in the brief of appellant to a case in which this same name figured as a plaintiff in a case to compel the board of supervisors to fix the rate of tolls, which case was appealed to this court. Volcano Canyon Road Co. v. Board of Sup'rs of Placer Co., 88 Cal. 634, 26 Pac. Rep. 513. In that case it was said that the board, on that application, could not inquire whether the plaintiff was legally incorporated, or owned the road. It seems a very startling proposition that a person taking a name, apparently of a corporate body, and in his complaint asserting it to be such, can take possession of a public highway which was laid out and built, and is being controlled, by this very board, and compel that body to fix rates of toll, and allow the applicant to appropriate the highway, without the right to question the corporate character, although no such pretended body ever existed, or claimed to exist, save in the petition to have the rates fixed. Weaverville & M. W. R. Co. v. Board of Sup'rs of Trinity Co., 64 Cal. 69, is relied upon as authority for this proposition. But in that case it was proven and found that the plaintiff was an acting corporation, and it was simply held that in that proceeding this was sufficient and conclusive. In this case there are no persons acting under the name. There are no directors or officers, and no acts in corporate form.

As to the other proposition, it has been held in numerous cases that the board, when such application is made, may and should inquire as to the right of the applicant to a franchise; and it has been held that, because the board on such an application has determined this right, an individual who is using the road cannot question it. Turnpike Road Co. v. Campbell, 44 Cal. 89. In Blood v. Woods, 95 Cal. 78, 30 Pac. Rep. 129, it was said that all toll roads are public roads, and to some extent under the control of the board of supervisors, and that the roads upon which they may be required to fix rates of toll are those laid out and built as toll roads under the provisions of the Code. This is not a proceeding for fixing rates, but an inquiry on behalf of the state as to the authority of the defendant, if there be one, to collect tolls. No such right has been shown. It seems to be claimed that, in the allegation quoted from the complaint, it is admitted that prior to six months immediately preceding the action the defendant had a franchise. But this is not so. It is a very cautious statement, but is entirely consistent with the proposition that defendant never had a franchise at any time. The pleader might have contented himself with merely stating the fact that the defendant was claiming and exercising a franchise, and averred that it was without right, or he might have averred the existence of a franchise at some time, and shown that it had terminated, or been forfeited. In the last case the facts showing that it had ended or had been forfeited should have been stated. The complaint here, though containing some unnecessary statements, is quite sufficient for a complaint of the first character, but is insufficient for a complaint in the other class of cases. The corporate character of the defendant is admitted in the pleadings; still the evidence shows, beyond doubt, that there is no defendant. It is nominis umbra, merely. I advise that the order be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

WARNER v. WARNER et al. (No. 19,080.)

CHANGING PLACE OF TRIAL—ACTION FOR DIVORCE.

1. Civil Code, § 128, as amended by Act March 10, 1891, providing that a divorce must not be granted unless plaintiff has been a resident of the county "in which the action is brought three months next preceding the commencement of the action," does not prevent a change of the place of trial of an action for divorce to the county in which defendant resides, since Code Civil Proc. § 395, provides that "in all other cases (excepting actions relating to real property, for the recovery of penalties, and those against municipal corporations and public officers, etc.) the action must be tried in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside at the commencement of the action." De Haven, J., dissenting.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 393, provides that if the county in which the action is commenced is not the proper county for the trial thereof the action may, notwithstanding, be tried therein, unless defendant demands in writing that trial be had in the proper county. Held, that where the bill of exceptions recites that a "notice in due form" of the motion by defendant for a change in the place of trial was filed, and no objection was raised to the absence of a demand in writing, it will be presumed on appeal that the notice included a proper demand. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by Warner against Warner and another. From an order changing the place of trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Rolfe & Freeman, for appellant. Wells, Monroe & Lee, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. This is an action for a divorce and a division of the community property. It is alleged that F. R. Warner, who is joined as a defendant with the husband of the plaintiff, received from the husband a fraudulent conveyance of certain real property, situated in San Bernardino county, with the intent to defraud the plaintiff of her community interest therein. The prayer is for a divorce, a cancellation of the conveyance, and a division of the property fraudulently conveyed. The action was brought in the county of San Bernardino, the complaint alleging that the plaintiff had resided in the state for more than one year, and in the county of San Bernardino for more than three months, next preceding the commencement of the action. The court, on motion of the defendants, changed the place of trial from San Bernardino to Los Angeles county, upon the sole ground that the defendants were residents of the latter county. Appellant contends that under section 128 of the Civil Code an action for divorce must be brought in the county of the plaintiff's residence, and cannot be removed therefrom except on account of the convenience of witnesses, or where it is made to appear that an impartial trial cannot be had, or that the judge of the county is disqualified from acting. The section referred to, as originally incorporated into the Codes, provided that "a divorce must not be granted unless the plaintiff has been a resident of the state for six months next preceding the commencement of the action." As amended by the act of March 10, 1891, it now reads that "a divorce must not be granted unless the plaintiff has been a resident of the state for one year, and of the county in which the action is brought three months next preceding the commencement of the action." It is said it would lead to an absurdity to hold that a husband could compel his wife to bring an action in a county other than the one in which he lived,—in the county where she resides,— and afterwards, on his own motion, have the cause removed to the county of his residence; but in making this new provision the legislature was looking out for the interests of the public, as well as the interests of the parties. Prior to the passage of this amendment, reproach had been brought upon the administration of our divorce laws by the frequency of proceedings commenced by complainants in counties where neither of the parties resided, the purpose being generally to avoid notoriety in the community where the plaintiff was known, and in some instances to obtain a decree by collusion, or to vex the defendant, or make it impossible or inconvenient for him or her to present a defense. It was the purpose of the amendment to correct this abuse. The state has an interest in the result of such cases. The public welfare demands that the bonds of matrimony should not be lightly set aside, and there is less probability of successful collusion or unfair advantage where the parties have both resided and are known, than there is in a county where neither has resided, and which the plaintiff may select for the purpose solely of procuring a divorce. It is true, before the amendment, a defendant had the right to have the cause transferred to his or her place of residence for trial, and to this extent the defendant's rights were protected; but the amendment tends to discourage the practice referred to, saves the defendant in a great many instances from the necessity and expense of moving for a change of the place of trial, and renders it less probable that the parties will allege or admit grounds of divorce which their friends and neighbors know to be false. Thus are the interests of not only the defendant, but of the public, in a measure protected.

Section 128 must be read in connection with sections 395 and 397, Code Civil Proc. The former is a limitation as to the place for the commencement of actions of divorce; the latter provide for the place of trial. The absurdity suggested is no greater than that which may arise under section 5, art. 6, of the constitution. That section provides that "all actions for the recovery of the possession of, quieting title to, or for the enforcement of liens upon, real estate, shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or any part thereof, affected by such action or actions is situated." The plaintiff may be morally certain that the action would have to be tried in another county, either because of the convenience of the witnesses or disqualification of the judge, and yet the action must be commenced in the county where the real estate is situated. It has been held here that there is no inconsistency between this section and the provisions of the Code relating to the place of trial. Hancock v. Burton, 61 Cal. 70. We do not look to the Civil Code for methods of procedure. The legislature has, for the reasons suggested, provided that no divorce shall be granted unless the plaintiff has resided in the county where the action is commenced for three months, but we look to the Code of Civil Procedure to determine all questions relating to the place of trial.

The inconvenience and injustice suggested by appellant is more fancied than real. The cases in which the plaintiff will be put to inconvenience must necessarily be rare. Furthermore, when the question of inconvenience is considered, it will be found not entirely one-sided. A party desiring to secure a divorce may under the construction claimed by appellant, by establishing a residence in a distant county, put the defendant to the trouble and expense of having the case tried away from the place of his residence, unless he can show inconvenience of witnesses or disqualification of the judge. But all such speculation has nothing to do with the matter. It is the duty of the court to give effect to the law as it finds it, and not be led away from the rules of construction by considerations of inconvenience. It is sufficient for us to know that effect can be given to both provisions by the construction which we give them, while the construction contended for would in effect nullify the provisions of section 395, Code Civil Proc., so far as actions for divorce are concerned.

It is further contended by the appellants that the action, being one in part to set aside a fraudulent sale and conveyance of land, necessarily involves the determination of a right or interest in real property, and therefore comes within the provision of section 392, Code Civil Proc. That section provides that an action "for the recovery of real property, or of an estate or interest therein, or for the determination in any form of such right or interest," must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial. The object of the action, however, was not simply to procure the cancellation of the deed and reconveyance of the property. Another and probably much greater object was to secure a dissolution of the bonds of matrimony, and, so far as this last matter was the subject of the action, the proper county for the trial thereof was the county of the defendant's residence. It has been held here that, if real and personal actions are joined in the same complaint, the case falls within section 395, Code Civil Proc., and must be tried in the county of the defendant's residence. Smith v. Smith, 88 Cal. 572, 26 Pac. Rep. 356; Ah Fong v. Sternes, 79 Cal. 33, 21 Pac. Rep. 381; Le Breton v. Superior Court, 66 Cal. 30, 4 Pac. Rep. 777. The defendant F. R. Warner might perhaps have insisted upon the action being retained in the county of San Bernardino for trial, but, if any such right existed, he waived it by joining the other defendant in the application for a transfer to Los Angeles county. O'Neill v. O'Neill, 54 Cal. 187. In the bill of exceptions, facts are cited sufficient upon which to base an order changing the place of trial. The order is affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

DE HAVEN, J. I dissent from the judgment.

HARRISON, J., (concurring.) I think the order appealed from should be affirmed. In my opinion the amendment of 1891 to section 128, Civil Code, was intended to prescribe a residence of three months in some particular county as a jurisdictional condition to be shown by the plaintiff before he should be entitled to a divorce, just as the previous requisite, which is also retained, of six months' residence in the state, is a jurisdictional condition to entertaining his application for a divorce. The right to a divorce is particularly a matter of statutory creation, and the legislature has the same right to prescribe the conditions in procedure upon which a suit shall be instituted in its courts as it has to limit the causes for which the divorce may be granted. This construction of the section is consistent with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure for changing the place of trial of the action after it has been brought, and gives full force to the several provisions of both Codes.

No objection was made in the court below to the absence of a demand in writing for a change of the place of trial, and, as the bill of exceptions states that a "notice in due form" of the motion therefor was filed by the defendant, it can be assumed here that the notice included a proper demand.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. There was no demand in writing for a change of the place of trial ever filed by the defendants, or either of them, and such demand has more than once been held by this court to be essential to the validity of an order changing the place of trial. Code Civil Proc. § 396;¹ Estrada v. Orena, 54 Cal. 407; Byrne v. Byrne, 57 Cal. 343. Unless these decisions are to be reversed, the order appealed from should be reversed. As to the point discussed in the opinion of the court, I concur in the main in the views expressed by Justice PATERSON, but for the reason above stated I must dissent from the judgment of affirmance.

¹ The section provides: "If the county in which the action is commenced is not the proper county for the trial thereof, the action may, notwithstanding, be tried therein, unless the defendant, at the time he appears and answers or demurs, files an affidavit of merits, and demands, in writing, that the trial be had in the proper county."

PARTNERSHIP—ACCOUNTING—NOVATION.

A lumber firm agreed with two of its members to sell them sawed lumber at a certain price. The two members formed a new firm, and one of them sold his interest in the contract to the other, and the latter sold interests therein to two strangers. The old firm continued to sell to the purchasing concern under the agreement, and to receive payment therefrom, without regard to its personnel, the bills being in all instances made out in the name of the purchasing concern. There was no evidence of any agreement to release the original contractors. Held, that there was no novation, and the lumber firm could sue one of the purchasing members for an accounting without joining his new associates in the purchasing contract.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by J. E. Chapin, T. E. Peckinpagh, and Charles Peckinpagh against Albert Brown for an accounting. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. P. Davidson, for appellant. J. R. Webb and L. L. Cory, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. On August 15, 1887, the plaintiffs and the defendant were copartners doing business in the firm name of Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company. Their business was that of manufacturing and selling lumber. They owned 160 acres of timber land, upon or near which they had built a sawmill. On August 15, 1887, a written contract between the copartnership and two of its individual members, namely, Chapin and the defendant Brown, was executed, by which the copartnership agreed to sell to Chapin and Brown, and the latter agreed to purchase, all the lumber to be sawed from the timber then standing or fallen on the said 160 acres of land, "or that may be sawed in the mill of the said parties of the first part [the copartnership] from other claims before finishing sawing the timber from the above-described claim, [the 106 acres,]" at the price of $9 per thousand feet, to be delivered in the mill yard. The parties of the first part further agreed that after the year 1887 they would deliver, as aforesaid, "an annual amount of one million feet or more, at the option of the said second parties." The agreement contains other stipulations not relevant to the issues in this case. On the same day (August 15, 1887) another agreement was executed between the copartnership and two others of its members, namely, T. E. Peckinpagh and Charles Peckinpagh, by which the latter agreed to cut, haul, and saw into lumber all the timber on said 160 acres of land, and to stack the lumber in said mill yard, for which they were to be paid $6 per thousand feet. As to the amount of lumber to be sawed, they agreed to be governed by the above-mentioned contract with Chapin and Brown. For the purpose of performing this contract they were to have the use of said mill, but were to keep it in repair. This contract also contains matters not material to this case. Chapin and Brown assumed to constitute a distinct copartnership under the firm name of North Fork Lumber Company, and transacted the business under their contract with the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company in that name; but at some time prior to January 1, 1888, Chapin assigned his interest in their contract with the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company to Brown, who agreed with him to perform all its obligations, and withdrew from the North Fork Lumber Company. Brown continued the business under the contract in the name of North Fork Lumber Company until January, 1888, when he assigned an interest in the contract to John Bartram, and on May 1, 1888, assigned another interest to B. F. Ellis. After these assignments, Brown, Bartram, and Ellis constituted the North Fork Lumber Company, and conducted the business with the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company under the lumber contract in that name. In the fall of 1888, T. E. and Charles Peckinpagh assigned their contract with the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company of August 15, 1887, (above set out,) to the North Fork Lumber Company. By the performance of this contract on the part of the Peckinpaghs, the North Fork Lumber Company became entitled to receive from the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company $6 per thousand feet for manufacturing the lumber which they were to purchase from the latter company at the price of $9 per thousand. From and after this assignment by the Peckinpaghs, Charles Peckinpagh was employed by the North Fork Lumber Company, at a salary, to do the sawing, and he continued in that position during the years 1890 and 1891.

The object of this action is to dissolve the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company, to compel an accounting between its members, and especially between the copartnership and the defendant, who, it is alleged, owes the concern a balance of $3,090 for lumber delivered to the North Fork Lumber Company during the year 1890, under the contract first above mentioned, called the "purchasing contract." The court found him to be individually responsible on that contract, and that he was indebted on that account to the other members of the company as follows: To Charles Peckinpagh, $427.45; to T. E. Peckinpagh, $471.85; to J. E. Chapin, $483.80,—amounting to $1,383.18; and consequently that he was indebted to the copartnership (of which he was an equal member) in the sum of $1,844.14. The judgment was in accordance with this finding. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The appellant contends that there was a novation of the purchasing contract by which the assignees of portions thereof were substituted for the original contractors (Brown and Chapin) by consent of the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company, and therefore that appellant is not individually liable, as found by the court. It is not claimed, however, that there was any evidence of such novation, or consent thereto, by the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company, other than the facts that the lumber was delivered to and paid for (so far as payments were made) by the North Fork Lumber Company, as constituted at the times of such delivery and payments. Brown never assigned all his interest in the purchasing contract, but remained a member of the North Fork Lumber Company during all its transactions with the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company. Nor is there any evidence that the latter company ever agreed or consented to discharge him or Chapin from their obligation on that contract, to accept Bartram or Ellis in their stead for any part of such obligation. No objection on the ground of misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties to the action was made by demurrer or answer, or otherwise, in the court below, nor is any point made here on this ground. All the parties to the purchasing contract, and all the members of the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company were before the court, and, as there as no novation of that contract, neither Bartram nor Ellis was a necessary party to the accounting. The state of accounts between the members of the North Fork Lumber Company is immaterial for any purpose of this action.

2. The only other point requiring consideration arises on the following additional facts: During the year 1890, while Charles Peckinpagh was doing the sawing for the North Fork Lumber Company, as aforesaid, he and a Mrs. Bearden sold and delivered to the North Fork Lumber Company a lot of logs cut from other lands than the 160 acres belonging to the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company, and to which the latter company held no title. These logs were sawed by Charles Peckinpagh during 1890, while employed by the North Fork Lumber Company, as aforesaid, and produced 683,923 feet of lumber, which was piled in the mill yard, and thence removed by the North Fork Lumber Company. The evidence tends to prove that these logs were sawed with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiffs, and with an understanding between plaintiffs and the North Fork Lumber Company that the latter was to pay the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company, for the use of their mill in sawing those logs, 50 cents per thousand feet; and it appears that a large portion of the lumber sawed from those logs must have entered into the estimate of the 1,030,000 feet alleged and found to have been delivered to defendant in 1890, under the contract set out in the complaint. The appellant contends that the lumber produced from those logs purchased by the North Fork Lumber Company never was the property of the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company, and therefore could not have been sold or delivered as such, under the contract set out in the complaint, and that the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company were entitled to charge only for the use of the mill in sawing those logs at the agreed price of 50 cents per thousand instead of $3 per thousand, which they were to receive for the lumber sawed from timber taken from the land of the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company. Thus far, perhaps, appellant is right, but his assumption that in the accounting the court credited the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company $3 per thousand for the lumber sawed from the logs purchased by the North Fork Lumber Company is not sustained by the record. Assuming that all the lumber sawed before January 1, 1890, had been paid for before the commencement of this action, as seems to be admitted, and that only the lumber sawed in 1890 and 1891 is involved, as appears by the findings of the court, and also assuming that only 50 cents per thousand was credited to the Sugar Pine Mill & Lumber Company on account of the 683,923 feet produced from the logs purchased by the North Fork Lumber Company, and $3 per thousand for all the lumber sawed from other timber during 1890 and 1891, viz. 735,121 feet, yet the judgment against the defendant would seem to be considerably less than it should have been. The 735,121 feet sawed from other timber than logs purchased by the North Fork Lumber Company, at $3 per thousand, would amount to $2,205. Deduct from this one-fourth thereof for defendant's share, and the remainder due the other three partners is $1,654, whereas only $1,383.18 was allowed them by the court. This result is justified by the fact that the accounting was not confined to the year 1890, during which the logs purchased by the North Fork Lumber Company were sawed, but included, without objection, the 389,044 feet of lumber produced from other timber during 1891. It may be that the defendant was properly credited with payments or set-offs not shown by the record, which accounts for this result. However this may be, it is enough for the disposition of this appeal that the records shows no error prejudicial to the appellant. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

GRIBBLE et al. v. COLUMBUS BREWING CO. et al. (No. 18,091.)

CORPORATION — MORTGAGE BY PRESIDENT — AUTHORITY — RATIFICATION — FORECLOSURE — ATTORNEY'S FEES — RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE — DENIAL ON INFORMATION AND BELIEF.

1. A corporation authorized its president to execute a mortgage to secure a loan, at a rate of interest and for a length of time specified. The mortgage executed by him was for a shorter period than authorized, and provided that the interest should be paid monthly, that a failure to pay interest when due rendered the principal due, and that the mortgagees should recover attorney's fees in case of foreclosure. These conditions were not authorized, but the company accepted the money and used it for the purposes intended, and paid the interest on the mortgage monthly for four months. Held that, in an action to foreclose the mortgage for default in interest, the corporation and its assignee were estopped from denying the authority of the president to execute it.

2. Where the answer, in such action, simply denies the "due execution" of the mortgage for want of authority, but does not deny the facts shown by the pleadings which constitute a ratification, plaintiffs are entitled to judgment without proof of authority.

3. In such case plaintiffs are entitled to recover the attorney's fees, also, provided for in such mortgage.

4. Such assignee, in the absence of fraud, is in no better position than such corporation.

5. A denial in answer by such assignee, on information and belief, that certain appliances connected with property described in the mortgage were attached to the realty and were fixtures, was insufficient, since he must be presumed to be in possession and to have knowledge as to such fact.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Action by H. Gribble and Seth Gainsley against the Columbus Brewing Company, and Lee Stanley, its assignee, to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment entered on the pleadings in favor of plaintiffs, defendant Stanley appeals. Affirmed.

Holl & Dunn, Clinton L. White, and Add. C. Hinkson, for appellant. Armstrong & Plattauer, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. A decree in favor of the plaintiffs was entered upon the pleadings, from which Lee Stanley, the assignee in insolvency of the Columbus Brewing Company, (a corporation,) defendant, appeals.

The admitted facts of the amended and supplemental complaint, coupled with certain affirmative allegations of the answer, show that the property described in the pleadings, and known as the "Columbus Brewery," with the machinery, trade fixtures, tools, etc., was formerly owned by Chris. Wahl and wife, who, on the 27th day of October, 1890, conveyed the same to the defendant the Columbus Brewing Company, subject to a debt of $16,000, secured by a mortgage upon the real property and a chattel mortgage upon the personalty, held by the Germania Building & Loan Association, and evidenced by a prom-

Issuory note drawing interest at 10½ per cent. per annum. This mortgage contained a provision that for a failure to pay any installment on said note when due, or any interest thereon when due, a foreclosure might be had for the whole at the option of the mortgagee, and for counsel fees on foreclosure. On the 9th day of March, 1891, the defendant corporation, being desirous of paying off the debt so secured by mortgages upon its property, negotiated a loan of $17,000 of the plaintiffs, and to secure the same with interest at 10 per centum, by its president, authorized as hereinafter stated, made its promissory note to plaintiffs for said sum of $17,000, with interest at 10 per centum, interest payable monthly, and, if not so paid, then the whole of the principal and interest to become due and payable. To secure the payment of said promissory note the defendant, by its president, authorized as hereafter stated, executed a mortgage upon its property, including fixtures, tools, etc. The mortgage provided for a counsel fee on foreclosure, and that a receiver might be appointed, etc.

The following is a copy of the motion and resolution under which authority was given to the president of the corporation defendant to make the note and execute the mortgage, except that the resolution as offered and passed contained the words "one year" as the period for the loan, and by inadvertence and mistake in making a record of the resolution the words "five years" were written instead of "one year:" "The following motion was made by E. Gunn, seconded by J. Schneider: Whereas, this corporation is indebted to the Germania Building and Loan Association in the sum of sixteen thousand dollars, ($16,000,) and it is desirous to transfer said loan to other parties; and whereas, further, H. Gribble and Seth Gainsley have offered to loan to said corporation the said sum of sixteen thousand dollars and one thousand dollars more, making seventeen thousand, ($17,000,) and to take a mortgage on the real and personal property belonging to said corporation: It is therefore resolved that the president be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in the name and for the use and benefit of said corporation, to negotiate said loan of seventeen thousand dollars, ($17,000,) with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, from the said Gribble and Gainsley, for the period of five (5) years, and in the name and for the benefit of said corporation to execute, acknowledge, and deliver to said Gribble and Gainsley a mortgage on all the real and personal property belonging thereto, or so much thereof as may be necessary to secure said loan; and the president is further authorized and directed to do any and all acts in the name of the corporation that may be necessary to secure said loan."

Plaintiffs advanced to the corporation defendant the $17,000, with which the latter paid off and discharged the prior mortgage held by the Germania Building & Loan Association, and used the residue of the loan in its business. That the defendant corporation had full knowledge of all the facts stated herein, including the fact that the loan was made for one year, that interest was payable monthly, and as to all stipulations and covenants of the note and mortgage, and with such knowledge it paid the interest on the promissory note monthly, as the same became due, until July 5, 1891, when for one month it failed to pay the interest which became due, whereby by the terms of the note the principal and interest became due, and this action was brought to foreclose the mortgage. The corporation answered the amended and supplemental complaint, admitting all the allegations thereof except the claim therein of a counsel fee of $857, and averred that $500 is as much as should be allowed by the court as a counsel fee. Subsequent to the commencement of the action the corporation defendant was adjudged insolvent, and defendant Lee Stanley was duly appointed assignee of said insolvent, qualified as such, and is still assignee. He was made a defendant herein, and has answered, raising the questions presented by the foregoing facts. Succinctly stated, his answer admits the indebtedness to the plaintiffs, but denies the authority of the president of the corporation defendant to contract the loan for one year, or to make the interest payable monthly, or to provide that, if not so paid, the principal should become due, or to provide for the payment of a counsel fee upon a foreclosure of the mortgage. He also avers as to certain property, averred in the complaint to be fixtures attached to the building and necessary to the brewing business conducted therein, a want of information or belief sufficient to enable him to answer, and therefore denies the truth of the allegations relating thereto. Plaintiffs' mortgage was recorded upon execution, and notice lis pendens filed, when the action was commenced. The prayer of the complaint, among other things, demands that the plaintiffs may be subrogated to the lien and rights of the Germania Building & Loan Association; that defendant Stanley be estopped to deny that the president of the corporation defendant had authority to execute the note and mortgage as therein specified; that the resolution of the corporation be reformed so as to read "one year," instead of "five years," etc.

Conceding, without deciding, that the president of the corporation defendant was without authority to execute a mortgage for the term, and with the conditions as to the dates at which interest was to be paid, the penalty following nonpayment of such interest, and the provision as to a counsel fee upon foreclosure, and we still think the decree was proper. The note and mortgage were such as the corporation had a right to authorize, and consequently were not ultra vires. The most that can be claimed is that the contract as executed was in excess of the power conferred by the board of directors upon the president,—that it varied from the authority given him. In this respect the transaction does not differ from that of an agent of an individual who has exceeded his authority. That which a principal may authorize an agent to perform, he may ratify when performed by the latter without authority; and where, with full knowledge of all the facts involved, a principal reaps the fruits of the unauthorized contract of his agent, and for some time yields acquiescence to its provisions, he will be deemed to have ratified it, and will be estopped, as against one who has fully performed the contract on his part, from repudiating it to the injury of the latter; and this doctrine applies to corporations equally with individuals. Main v. Casserly, 67 Cal. 127, 7 Pac. Rep. 426; Pixley v. Railroad Co., 33 Cal. 198; Foulke v. Railroad Co., 51 Cal. 365; Bradley v. Ballard, 55 Ill. 413; Jones v. Clark, 42 Cal. 180. Taylor, in discussing the question of acquiescence by private corporations in the unauthorized acts of their agents, at section 211 of his work on Corporations uses the following language: "If an unauthorized act is done on behalf of a corporation, although the corporation may not be bound by the act as done, yet if the corporation, or that corporate authority which would have been competent to do the act, knowingly ratifies it or accepts the benefit of it, or if all the persons having a right to object to the act knowingly acquiesce in it, the act will be as binding on the corporation as if it had been originally authorized. This proposition is but an application of the doctrine of the law of agency that, when a person ratifies the unauthorized act of another who has purported to act on his behalf, the legal effect of the act will be the same as if it had been authorized before it was done." "A voluntary acceptance of the benefits of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it, so far as the facts are known, or ought to be known, to the person accepting." Civil Code, § 1589; Borel v. Rollins, 30 Cal. 409. It is not deemed necessary to pursue this inquiry further, or to quote at greater length from the multitude of authorities in support of the position. The foregoing remarks must be understood as applying to private corporations and to executed contracts. The rule as to municipal corporations and as to executory contracts by private corporations is quite different.

The admitted facts of this case which bring the defendants within the doctrine enunciated may be epitomized thus: (1) The president of the corporation defendant included in the note and mortgage terms and conditions which the corporation had power to authorize, but which it did not authorize him to insert. (2) The defendant corporation received the consideration of $17,000 from the plaintiffs, and applied the money to its uses, including the payment of a prior mortgage upon its property and the extinguishment of the lien thereof. (3) The corporation defendant, by its representations, declarations, and acts, through its directors, intentionally led the plaintiffs to believe, and they did believe, the president of the corporation was authorized to execute the note and mortgage for one year, with interest payable monthly. (4) The defendant corporation, with full knowledge of the terms and conditions of the note and mortgage, received and used the consideration of $17,000, and paid the interest thereon monthly as the same became due, from March 9, 1891, to July 5, 1891.

These facts are sufficient to constitute a ratification of the acts of the president of the corporation, and are sufficient to support the invocation of an estoppel in pais set out in the complaint.

A review of the answer of defendant Lee Stanley shows that he admits the indebtedness of $17,000 and interest; that he nowhere denies that the note and mortgage were in fact executed, as set out in the complaint, but he does deny the due execution of those instruments, or that the president of the corporation defendant was authorized so to do, or that the defendant ever promised to pay interest except annually, etc. The second defense sets out the motion and resolution of the defendant authorizing the president to negotiate the loan and to execute the mortgage, and avers the mistake by which "one year" was changed so as to read "five years." He further avers that at the date of the mortgage the defendant corporation was indebted to divers persons in large sums of money, which have not been paid, etc. The denials of the answer do not extend to the facts constituting a ratification, hence we are enabled to say they are strictly true; and yet the plaintiffs, by reason of the additional facts which are not denied, are entitled to a judgment.

The cases of Read v. Buffum, 79 Cal. 77, 21 Pac. Rep. 555, and Association v. Bustamente, 52 Cal. 192, are authority for the necessity of proof as to the authority of corporate agents, but have no application to a case like the present, where the want of authority in such agent is admitted, and the validity of the contract is based upon the ratification by the corporation of the confessedly unauthorized act of its agent.

Schallard v. Navigation Co., 70 Cal. 144, 11 Pac. Rep. 590, and Hardin v. Construction Co., (Iowa,) 43 N. W. Rep. 543, are relied upon to defeat the right of plaintiffs to recover an attorney's fee on foreclosure. The same considerations apply to this contention as to that touching the authority of the agent. There was no suggestion in either of those cases as to a ratification by the defendants of the unauthorized acts of their agents.

The defendant Lee Stanley is in no better situation than the corporation defendant, and is equally concluded with it. There is no suggestion of fraud, and the creditors whom he represents are not subsequent purchasers in good faith for valuable consideration, nor are they shown to have any specific lien, or any lien, upon the property. The estate of the insolvent constitutes a fund for their payment, and that estate must be supposed to be enriched just so much by the $17,000 furnished it by the loan of the plaintiffs, and, being secured by a specific lien, they, like any other holders of like liens, are entitled to precedence to the extent of their lien over general creditors. In Darst v. Gale, 83 Ill. 136, and Beecher v. Mill Co., 45 Mich. 103, 7 N. W. Rep. 695, the courts held that subsequent purchasers of the mortgaged property could not show that the corporations had executed the mortgages in excess of their corporate powers.

The denial upon information and belief by defendant Lee Stanley that certain appliances in the brewery were attached to the realty and were fixtures was insufficient. Defendant, as assignee in insolvency, must be presumed to have been in possession of the property, and to have known whether or not the appliances named were so attached, and hence the denial should have been positive in form. Loveland v. Garner, 74 Cal. 298, 15 Pac. Rep. 844, and cases there cited.

The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MITCHELL et al. v. DONOHUE. (No. 19, 213.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 2, 1893.)

HOLOGRAPHIC WILL—VALIDITY—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. An instrument as follows: "This is to serifey that ie levet to mey wife Real and persnal and she to dispose for them as she wis,"—dated and signed, is not vague and uncertain, and devises to the wife all the real and personal property of the husband.

2. Where a will is contested on the ground that the husband, while sick, was importuned by his wife to make it in her favor, against his wishes, the court properly restricted evidence of the inharmonious life led by the parties to the last three or four years of testator's life.

3. Where a holographic will is offered for probate, and the court states that the only evidence of its execution is that given in detail by the wife, which, if believed, would establish the will, the charge is not erroneous, as excluding from the jury evidence offered by contestants that deceased did not mean it to be a will, where such an issue has already been presented to the jury under proper instructions.

Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Application of Kate Donohue for the probate of the will of her husband, Patrick Donohue. From a judgment admitting the will to probate, Kate Mitchell and others appeal. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of the commissioners:

"BELCHER, C. Patrick Donohue died in San Luis Obispo county on the 19th day of February, 1892, leaving surviving him his wife, the respondent, Kate Donohue, but no children, and also leaving an estate consisting of real and personal property of the value of about $15,000. His heirs at law, other than his widow, were one sister, and several nephews and nieces, children of two deceased brothers. In due time the widow filed in the superior court of San Luis Obispo county her petition, in proper form, asking that a paper accompanying the petition be admitted to probate as the last will of her deceased husband. The accompanying paper, as is shown by a photographic copy thereof brought here in the record, reads as follows: 'Crolldepdro, february 3, 1892. this is to serifey that ie levet to mey wife Real and persnal and she to dispose for them as she wis. Patrick Donohue.' A day was set for hearing the petition, and on that day the sister and one nephew and four nieces of the decedent appeared, and filed written grounds of opposition to the probate of the alleged will. The grounds stated were as follows: (1) 'Said instrument is not a will, nor is it the last will or testament of said Patrick Donohue, deceased.' (2) 'Said instrument was not written by said Patrick Donohue freely or voluntarily, or at all.' (3) 'At the time of the execution of said instrument, said Patrick Donohue, in executing the same, was under duress, menace, fraud, and undue influence, and he was not then competent to make a last will and testament. At the time of the execution of said instrument, and for some time prior thereto, said Patrick Donohue was at his home at Corral de Piedra, in the above-named county, and was sick, and in great pain and suffering of body and mind; that his wife, Mrs. Kate Donohue, who now petitions to have said instrument admitted to probate as a will, constantly and repeatedly importuned, harassed, and annoyed said Patrick Donohue, deceased, concerning his and her property, and the disposition thereof, and gave him no rest, peace, or quiet upon the subject, and repeatedly urged him to transfer such property to her by deed or will; that in order to put a stop to such importunities, and thereby obtain for himself some peace, said Patrick Donohue, being by his said wife thereto coerced, and unduly influenced as aforesaid, did sign the aforesaid instrument, but not intending the same as or for his last will or testament, and the same is not his testament or will.' The petitioner served and filed her answer to the opposition, fully controverting thereby all the facts alleged by the contestants. The case was thereafter tried before a jury, and the following special issues were framed and submitted to them for decision: (1) Is the document presented for probate the last will of Patrick Donohue, deceased? (2) Was said document entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of Patrick Donohue himself? (3) If said document was written and signed by said Donohue, was it written and signed freely and voluntarily? (4) If said document was written and signed by said Donohue, was the same executed by him under duress? (5) If said document was written and signed by said Donohue, was the same executed by him through menace? (6) If said document was written and signed by said Donohue, was the same executed by him through fraud? (7) If said document was written and signed by said Donohue, was the same executed by him through undue influence? (8) Was said document executed by said Donohue as and for his last will? (9) Did Patrick Donohue intend this paper as his last will and testament? (10) Is this paper the last will and testament of said Patrick Donohue? To the first, second, third, eighth, ninth, and tenth questions thus submitted, the jurors by their verdict answered, 'Yes,' and to the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh questions they answered, 'No.' The court adopted the findings of the jury, and, in accordance therewith, further found that the said document 'is the last will and testament of Patrick Donohue, deceased; that it was executed in all particulars as required by law; and that said testator, at the time of the execution of the same, was of sound and disposing mind, and not acting under undue influence, menace, fraud, or duress.' And thereupon an order was made and entered, admitting the proposed will to probate, and appointing the petitioner administratrix of the estate of the decedent, with the will annexed. From this order, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, the contestants appeal.

" 'An olographic will is one that is entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator himself. It is subject to no other form, and may be made in or out of this state and need not be witnessed.' Civil Code, § 1277. And such a will may be proved in the same manner that other private writings are proved. Code Civil Proc. § 1309. A will may be informally drawn, and may consist of one or more papers. No particular words are necessary to show a testamentary intent. It must appear only that the maker intended by it to dispose of property after his death, and parol evidence as to the attending circumstances is admissible. And courts, in reading wills, always supply obviously omitted words, wherever the word omitted is apparent, and no other word will supply the defect. Estate of Wood, 36 Cal. 75; Clarke v. Ransom, 50 Cal. 595; Estate of Skerrett, 67 Cal. 585, 8 Pac. Rep. 181; 6 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 3140; Redf. Wills, pt. 1, p. 454. Counsel for respondent contend that the document in question here was intended by decedent as a testamentary disposition of his property, and that it was sufficient in form to meet the requirements of the law, and to justify its admission to probate as a will. As they read the paper, it is as follows: 'Corral de Piedra, February 3, 1892. This is to certify that I leave to my wife (my) real and personal (property,) and she to dispose of them as she wishes. Patrick Donohue.' Counsel for appellants, on the other hand, contend that the document was not entitled to probate as a will, because it is vague and uncertain as to the subject-matter, presenting a case of patent ambiguity which renders it absolutely void. This contention is rested upon the theory that it cannot be determined from the face of the paper whether the word 'levet' should be read as 'leave' or 'left,' nor what real or personal property is referred to, and, therefore, that the construction given to the paper by respondent is unauthorized. We are unable to see any such patent ambiguity in the language used as would render the paper void on its face. The court below evidently read the word 'levet' as 'leave,' and supplied the word 'my' before and 'property' after the words 'real and personal;' and in our opinion it was justified in doing so. As thus read, the paper shows a testamentary intent, which entitled it to probate.

"Counsel for appellants also contend that the court below committed numerous errors in the admission and exclusion of evidence. All of these alleged errors may be considered together, and a brief statement of the facts proved, and sought to be proved, will be sufficient: The decedent and respondent were married in 1869. They never had any children. Early in 1870, they went to San Luis Obispo county, and thereafter continued to live in that county. At the time of their marriage, she had about twenty-two or twenty-three hundred dollars in money, but he had no money or property. In May, 1870, they commenced working for wages; he doing farm work, and she household work, and continued in such employment until October, 1875, receiving most of the time $75 per month for their services. About the time they thus commenced working out, they loaned to their employers $1,900 of her money at 1¼ per cent. per month interest. This money, and their accumulated earnings, they subsequently invested in land, which they afterwards sold for about twice the sum it had cost them. In January, 1875, they purchased another tract, a part of the Rancho Corral de Piedra, containing 157.79 acres. Both of them were named in the deed as grantees, and the consideration expressed therein was $8,100. In December, 1877, he conveyed to her 57.79 acres of this tract, and the consideration expressed in his deed was $2,000. He also at some time gave her a bill of sale of one horse. In 1881, and again in 1888, they purchased a few acres of adjoining land; and the parcels thus purchased in 1875, 1881, and 1888 were owned by them, and constituted their home, at the time of his death. Seven or eight years before his death, he made a will, but it had been lost or destroyed. By that will, he devised all his property to his wife during her life, and after that it was to go to his other heirs. A few days before he wrote the paper in controversy, he became sick, resulting from an abscess in his back, and he continued to grow worse till he died. His mind, however, was clear and vigorous up to the day of his death. On the morning of February 3, 1891, he was up, and sitting by the dining-room table. He asked his wife for a sheet of paper, and when he obtained it he began to write. As to what then occurred, she testified as follows: 'So, when I saw him writing, I took my chair, and sat down. It was between eight and nine in the morning. When he got through writing, he passed it over to me. He says: "That's for you, for fear anything should happen, to protect you from them, because I know they will go for you. I made that will for you to save you. There is nothing there but your own hard earnings. I will tell you what to do with it. Sell it, put it in two banks, or put it in three banks, and sit down, and take comfort, and don't be no longer a slave for them. It is no more than right that there should be some person in here to sign that." There was no man I could call, and Mr. Gaxiola was off with the horses. He says: "Never mind. Take it, and put it in your trunk, and put it away; and every one in town knows my signature." And again: "When this paper was written, there was not one in the house but my husband and me. Nobody saw this paper, after it was written and put in my trunk, until Monday, February 22d, the day after the burial, and I did not inform a living being that it was in existence.' The contestants sought to prove that Mrs. Donohue became insanely jealous of her husband a dozen years or so before his death, and that she thereafter entertained and often expressed suspicions that he had or would transfer to others, without her knowledge or consent, all the real and personal property which he had conveyed to her, and would also dispose of his own property so that she would get nothing from it, and would be left destitute; that he and others had often told her that he had not conveyed away her property, and could not do so, and that all her suspicions and fears were groundless, but that their efforts in this behalf were futile, and failed to convince her. The court admitted all of this offered evidence as to what had been said and done by respondent within three or four years before her husband's death, but, on objection, excluded all of it relating to earlier dates. Counsel now insist that the paper presented as a will was not intended as such at all, but simply as a certificate that the writer 'left'—that is, transferred—to his wife several years before certain real and personal property, which was still hers, and subject to her disposal, and that his only purpose in making the paper was to allay her suspicions that he had subsequently transferred the same property to others; and it is claimed that the action of the court, in excluding the offered evidence, was erroneous, because, if admitted, it would have tended strongly to sustain the appellants' theory as to the true meaning and purpose of the paper. We fail to see any material error in any of the rulings complained of. The court, in allowing the contestants to go over the married life of the parties for three years and more, and to show up their little disputes, bickerings, and dissensions, seems to have been quite as liberal as any rule of law or common justice could require. Besides, as said in another contested will case, (In re Spencer, 96 Cal. 448, 31 Pac. Rep. 453:) 'It is difficult to conceive how the verdict and judgment could have been different, if the court had ruled throughout the trial as asked by appellants; and in such a case a judgment will not be reversed, even though some errors have occurred during the progress of the trial.'

"Counsel for appellants further contend that the court erred in striking out, and refusing to give to the jury, portions of two instructions asked by contestants, and in giving a portion of one of the instructions which it gave of its own motion. The clause stricken out from one of the instructions asked was, in effect, that the proponent of the alleged will must prove by a preponderance of evidence that the paper was intended by Patrick Donohue as his will, and that in this connection the jury might consider certain specified testimony. And the clause stricken out of the other instruction was that, 'as to the paper, the rule of law is that where an instrument is equally susceptible of two interpretations,—one in favor of natural rights, and the other against it,—the interpretation favoring natural rights is to be adopted. By 'natural rights' is meant the rights of the parties under the law if no will was made. And I instruct you that, if Patrick Donohue had made no will, the natural rights of his brothers and sisters, and of the children of any deceased brother or sister, would entitle them to a share of his estate.' There was no prejudicial error in striking out these clauses. The instructions, as given, plainly told the jury how, in the absence of a will, the estate of decedent would have been succeeded to and distributed, and that, in determining whether the paper in question was intended by the decedent as his will, they must take into consideration his mental and physical condition at the time the paper was written; who his relatives were, and the claims which they naturally had upon his bounty; any prior declarations which he may have made, going to show his intentions as to the disposition of his property after death; and the circumstance, if it existed, that before the date of the paper he had formed in his mind a settled purpose to dispose of his property in a manner different from what the paper purports to do; and also all of the testimony admitted in evidence and bearing upon the question, including the contents of the paper itself; and that the burden of proving that the paper was intended by the decedent as his will was upon the proponent. These instructions, with others that followed, presented the contestants' theory as to the case very clearly and fully, and they were therefore, in our opinion, in no way harmed by the action of the court complained of.

"In giving the instructions of its own motion, the court called attention to each of the special issues submitted, and, among other things, said: 'The next question is, was said document executed by said Donohue as and for his last will? The only testimony that the court recalls upon that—although you, gentlemen, have all the testimony before you—the testimony of Mrs. Donohue that he wrote it; he wrote it and signed; and he told her it was his will, and gave it to her. But, of course, you are the sole judges of fact; of the evidence, and the credibility of witnesses. If you believe that evidence, you should answer, "Yes." If you do not, you should answer, "No." It is objected that this portion of the instruction was erroneous because it practically withdrew from the consideration of the jury all of the evidence introduced by contestants for the purpose of showing that the paper was not executed as a will. We do not think the instruction was intended to have the effect charged, and, in view of the other instructions given, it seems impossible that it could have done so. As we read it, it simply calls attention to the only direct evidence as to the making of the paper, and tells the jury, if they believe that evidence to be true, they will answer, "Yes;" otherwise, "No." All the evidence was submitted to them, and, in view of it, they were to determine whether Mrs. Donohue's testimony as to the execution of the paper was true or not. The above disposes of the whole case, and it follows that the judgment and orders appealed from should be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. VITAL. (No. 20,957.)

CRIMINAL LAW—MURDER—ABSENCE OF INSTRUCTIONS FROM RECORD—SETTING ASIDE SUBMISSION OF CAUSE.

Where the record in a murder trial recites that the court read to the jury "instructions asked by the respective parties, and allowed by the court, and those given by the court of its own motion," but does not contain those given by the court of its own motion, or requested by the people, the appellate court will not determine whether or not the trial court erred in refusing to give an instruction asked by defendant, but will set aside a submission of the cause, and restore it to the calendar, to be heard when all the instructions are incorporated into the record.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Vital was convicted of murder, and appeals. Submission of cause set aside, and cause restored to the calendar.

A. D. Spilvalo and J. A. Spinetti, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The minutes of the trial of this case, and which constitute a part of the record, state that the court read to the jury "instructions asked by the respective parties, and allowed by the court, and those given by the court on its own motion;" but the record filed here does not contain any of the instructions thus referred to, except those given upon request of the defendant. One of the points made by the appellant is that the court erred in omitting to instruct the jury that they had the discretion, in case they found the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, to relieve him from the extreme penalty of death, and to say, by their verdict that his punishment should be confinement in the state prison for life. We do not think we should determine this question upon the record now before us; at least, until an opportunity is given to the attorney general to supply the instructions given by the superior court upon its own motion and upon request of the people, if such instructions were actually given. It is the duty of a judge to properly indorse all instructions given on his own motion, and when so indorsed they form a part of the record on appeal. People v. January, 77 Cal. 179, 19 Pac. Rep. 258. The submission of this cause will be set aside, and the case restored to the calendar. The attorney general will be allowed 30 days within which to file a complete record, showing all instructions given and refused by the superior court. So ordered.

SISSON, CROCKER & CO. v. JOHNSON et al. (No. 18,102.)

INJUNCTION—AGAINST TRESPASS—COMPLAINT.

A complaint by a corporation operating a sawmill, which alleges that plaintiff, the owner in fee of certain land, commenced the construction of a logging road thereon to convey timber to the mill; that defendants entered on the land, and obstructed the men employed by plaintiff in continuing the work, threatening to use violence should they persist, whereby the work was stopped; that such interruption was repeated when an attempt was again made to construct the road, and that defendants threaten such interruption whenever the work is attempted; that the road is necessary for the operation of the sawmill; and that defendants are insolvent,—warrants the granting of a preliminary injunction.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by Sisson, Crocker & Co., a corporation, against F. M. Johnson and others, for an injunction. A preliminary injunction was granted, and, from an order denying a motion to dissolve the same, defendant Johnson appeals. Affirmed.

The complaint alleges that plaintiff is a corporation, and that it "was, on and before May 1, 1892, ever since has been, and now is, the owner in fee of" certain described land. It then alleges as follows: "That on or about May 15, 1892, said plaintiff herein commenced the construction of a logging road on the land herein above described, for the purpose of conveying the timber from said land to the sawmill of the said plaintiff, and that for said purpose said plaintiff employed a large number of men, to wit, about seven men, at a great expense, to wit, about twenty-five ($25) dollars; that on or about May 25, 1892, the said defendant herein entered upon the premises herein above described, and obstructed and prevented the men employed as aforesaid by said plaintiff for the purpose of building said logging road from continuing their work thereon; that said defendants did at said time threaten to use violence toward said men, if they, or any of them, persisted in constructing said logging road on said lands, and that the men so employed by said plaintiff as aforesaid were by said threats of said defendants frightened, and prevented from continuing their work on said logging road, and that the construction of said logging road was thereby wholly stopped; that said plaintiff caused said men to attempt, on several different occasions, to continue their work on said logging road after the first interruption by said defendants, and during said month of May, but that said defendants at each time prevented the continuance of said work, and threatened to do so, by violence, whenever said plaintiff or its employees shall attempt to construct said logging road; * * * that the plaintiff is now, and at all of the times since May 1, 1892, has been, the owner of, and engaged in operating, a sawmill near the town of Sisson, in Siskiyou county, Cal., and that the timber for the transportation of which the aforesaid logging road is being constructed is necessary for the successful operation of said sawmill, and that unless the said defendants are restrained, by the order of the court from preventing the construction of the aforesaid logging road, and the transportation of timber on the same to said mill, the said plaintiff will be compelled to either close said sawmill, or operate the same at a loss; that the continuance of the aforesaid acts of said defendants, as hereinbefore alleged, will cause said plaintiff great and irreparable damage, and that defendants, as herein above stated, have heretofore and do now threaten to prevent the construction of said logging road by all means within their power; that the said defendants are, and each of them is, insolvent, and unable to respond in damages to plaintiff. Wherefore, said plaintiff prays that the said defendants, and each of them, their agents, employees, attorneys, and all persons claiming by, through, or under them, or either of them, be, by the order of this court, enjoined and restrained from in any way or manner interfering with the said logging road, or the proposed construction thereof on the land herein above described, and from interfering with the employees, and all of them, engaged at this time, or who may hereafter be engaged, in constructing said logging road, or any part thereof; also, from in any manner interfering with the land herein above described, or the timber situated thereon, or the employees of plaintiff operating thereon, for plaintiffs' costs of suit herein, and for such other or further relief as to the court may seem proper."

Warren & Taylor, (T. M. Osmont, of counsel,) for appellant. Gillis & Tapscott and E. J. Emmons, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. Appeal from an order refusing to dissolve a preliminary injunction. The complaint states facts sufficient to justify the issuance of the injunction sought to be dissolved, and the court did not err in its ruling upon the motion to dissolve the same. Order affirmed.

STEPHENSON v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.
(No. 10,186.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 10, 1893.)

RAILROAD COMPANIES—ACCIDENT AT CROSSING—PERSON JUMPING TO AVOID COLLISION—PLEADING—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The complaint in an action against a railroad company alleged that the driver of a horse car in which plaintiff was a passenger, on approaching a crossing of defendant's track, observed an engine standing on the track within 25 feet of the crossing, whereupon he stopped the car; that, after ascertaining that the engine was not in motion, he started to cross the track; that when he was very near it the engineer of defendant's engine negligently commenced to back it towards the car, whereupon the passengers, including plaintiff, observing that a collision was imminent, jumped from the car, and that in so doing plaintiff, though using due care, was injured. Held, that the complaint stated a cause of action.

2. An instruction that if defendant was guilty of negligence, as charged in the complaint, and plaintiff was injured thereby, the verdict must be for plaintiff, is not erroneous in ignoring the question of contributory negligence, when accompanied by several instructions making the right of recovery dependent on plaintiff's exercise of reasonable care.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by Sallie D. Stephenson against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John D. Bricknell, for appellant. Wells, Monroe & Lee, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff, who is respondent here, through the alleged negligence of defendant. Plaintiff had a verdict for $8,000, for which sum judgment was entered. The appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

The Sixth street car line of the Los Angeles City Railway crosses the track of the Southern Pacific Company on San Fernando street in the city of Los Angeles, near the San Fernando depot, and extends to East Los Angeles. The plaintiff, on the 26th day of December, 1889, was a passenger bound from East Los Angeles on a car of the street-car line, the motive power of which was a horse. Some 60 feet easterly from the railroad crossing is a switch and side track of the street-car line, upon which the car bearing plaintiff was run and stopped to allow an east-bound car of the Olive street line to pass. While so standing, a switch engine of defendant, propelled by steam, was observed on its track at or near the crossing, from which point it moved southerly some 50 feet south of the crossing, (probably to allow the east-bound Olive street car to pass,) where it stopped. The car containing plaintiff moved westerly to a point near the railway crossing, where it came to a full stop. The way being clear, it moved on. About simultaneously the switch engine of defendant rang its bell, and backed towards the crossing, which is diagonal to the course of the street railway. The driver of the street car whipped his horse across the track, and, as plaintiff testified, some one in the car called out, "All who want to save their lives jump," and, observing the approach of the engine, she jumped from the car, which was open at the sides. As she fell, her head struck the rail of the Olive street car line (which runs at this point nearly parallel with the track upon which plaintiff was a passenger) and received the injuries for which this action was brought. The switch engine was stopped some 15 or 20 feet before reaching the crossing. The street car had passed the crossing 5 feet when plaintiff jumped from it, the engine being still in motion. The fireman on the engine saw the street car, notified the engineer, and he stopped the engine. The servants of the defendant in charge of the engine did not wantonly and unnecessarily let the engine take steam and start it with intention thereby and for the purpose of frightening the street-car passengers.

The first point made by appellant relates to the sufficiency of the complaint, which, it is contended, does not state a cause of action. The second paragraph of the complaint, to which the attack is directed, averred that plaintiff was a passenger upon a certain street car, the line of which crossed the railway track, and had a right of way across the same; that the car driver, upon approaching the crossing, observed an engine of defendant standing upon the railway track within a short distance of such crossing, whereupon the street car came to a full stop, and remained standing a short time; that the street-car driver then ascertained that the engine was not in motion, and started his horse to cross the railroad track; that "when very near to defendant's track, to wit, within fifteen feet, and about to cross the same, the engineer of the defendant's engine negligently and carelessly gave his engine steam, and commenced to back the said locomotive upon the track towards and upon the street car aforesaid, whereupon the passengers, including this plaintiff, observing the proximity of said engine, and that the same was rapidly approaching said street car in which they were riding, and that there was imminent danger of a collision with said locomotive, commenced to make their escape from said car by jumping off therefrom, with a view and for the purpose of escaping injury from said engine; and that plaintiff, being in imminent danger of injury by the anticipated collision, jumped from said street car, as did the other passengers." Then follow allegations to the effect that the street car was on the crossing and the engine within 10 feet of it, and moving, when she jumped; that the danger was imminent; that she used due care, etc., but fell and was injured. At common law it was not necessary in a declaration for negligence to set out the facts in detail constituting the basis of the action. The following was a usual form against the owner of a carriage for negligent driving: "For that defendant so negligently drove his horse and carriage that the same struck against the carriage and horse of the defendant, whereby," etc., followed by an allegation of damage. In adopting what is known as the "code system of pleading," courts in most of the states have excepted from the general rule, requiring a complaint to state the facts constituting the cause of action in ordinary and concise language, cases founded upon negligence; or, rather, they have so far modified the rule as to permit the plaintiff to state the negligence in general terms, without stating the facts constituting such negligence. This modification of a rule of code pleading is founded in wisdom, and grows out of a fundamental rule in common-law pleading, to the effect that "no greater particularity is required than the nature of the thing pleaded will conveniently admit," (Steph. Pl. *367;) supported by that other rule that "less particularity is required when the facts lie more in the knowledge of the opposite party," (Id. 370.) In cases of negligence the sufferer may only know the general, the immediate cause of the injury, and may be entirely ignorant as to the specific acts or omissions which lead up to it. Bliss, in his work on Code Pleading, at section 308, gives the following illustration: "The driver upsets a stage coach, and breaks a passenger's arm. Careful driving will hardly have such a result. The passenger knows there has been negligence, but he may not know in what it consisted. The driver may have been drunk and asleep. He may have so harnessed the horses that they would not obey the rein, or may have made them unmanageable by improper treatment. The plaintiff can only prove that the coach was plumed over. The presumption is that it was the result of negligence; if not, the defendant can show it." The term "negligence," for the purpose of pleading, is a fact to be pleaded,—an ultimate fact, which qualifies an act otherwise not wrongful. Negligence is not the act itself, but the fact which defines the character of the act, and makes it a legal wrong. The absence of care in doing an act which produces injury to another, is actionable. The term "negligence" signifies and stands for the absence of care. "Negligence is the ultimate fact to be pleaded, and it forms part of the act from which an injury arises. * * * It is the absence of care in the performance of an act, and is not usually the result of such absence, but the absence itself, and is not, therefore, a mere conclusion of law, and may be pleaded generally." Railroad Co. v. Wolfe, 80 Ky. 84.

As a result of the application of these principles to code pleading in cases of negligence, and to others of kindred character, it is held in this state, and in nearly all of the United States, that it is sufficient to allege the negligence in general terms, specifying, however, the particular act alleged to have been negligently done. Thomp. Neg. 1246. Tested by these rules, the complaint, which was not demurred to, stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The case of Schindler v. Railway Co., decided by the supreme court of Michigan November 1, 1889, and reported in 43 N. W. Rep. 911, relied upon by appellant, at first blush seems in point; but an analysis of the complaint by the court shows that the inference drawn therefrom was that the driver of the sleigh was not shown to have relied, or had any reason to rely, on the train remaining still till he could pass, or that it started unexpectedly or improperly when it should have waited, or that it was improperly started. "This," says the court, "if it existed, would have been a very important element in the case." Again, the court says: "All that is averred is simply that defendant negligently struck a sleigh at a road crossing, the driver not being in fault." In the present case the complaint avers that the defendant's engine was standing on its track within 25 feet of the crossing; that the driver of the street car stopped, and, upon ascertaining that the engine was not in motion, started to cross the track, and when near it "the engineer of the defendant's engine negligently and carelessly gave his engine steam, and commenced to back the said locomotive upon the track towards and upon the street car aforesaid," etc. From this it will be seen the act by which the injury was brought about and the negligent manner of its performance is specified. The statement of other facts auxiliary to this main fact might have tended to a clearer conception of the principal act, but the most there can be said against the pleading is that it states a cause of action, but states it imperfectly, which is the equivalent of saying that it is good except as against a special demurrer. The nonsuit was properly denied.

There was evidence tending to show such negligence on the part of defendant, and contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, as made it proper to submit the question to the jury. Where the facts are admitted or proven without contradiction the court will determine whether or not they establish negligence or show contributory negligence; but where the conclusion is open to debate it is one for the jury under proper instructions from the court. Fernandes v. Railway Co., 52 Cal. 45; Orcutt v. Railway Co., 85 Cal. 291, 24 Pac. Rep. 661; Whalen v. Railroad Co., 92 Cal. 669, 28 Pac. Rep. 833; Wilson v. Railroad Co., 62 Cal. 164; Davies v. Steamship Co., 89 Cal. 280, 26 Pac. Rep. 827. The following instruction was given at the request of plaintiff: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant was guilty of negligence, as charged in the complaint, and that the plaintiff was injured thereby, your verdict should be for the plaintiff, and that whether such negligence appears or is proved by the testimony on the part of the plaintiff or by defendant's own witnesses." This instruction entirely ignores the question of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, and is, therefore, not in itself a complete and correct statement of the law, and the defendant insists that the judgment should be reversed for this reason. In answer to this contention it is sufficient to say that the rule is well settled here that instructions are to be read and considered as a whole, and the fact that, when taken separately, some of them may fail to enunciate in precise terms, and with legal accuracy, propositions of law, does not necessarily render them erroneous. "It is sufficient if all the instructions, taken together, and not being inconsistent with each other or confusing, shall give to the jury a fair and just notion of the law upon the point discussed." Davis v. Button, 78 Cal. 247, 18 Pac. Rep. 133, and 20 Pac. Rep. 545; People v. Lee Chuck, 78 Cal. 339, 20 Pac.

Rep. 719; Monaghan v. Rolling-Mill Co., 81 Cal. 190, 22 Pac. Rep. 590; Murray v. White, 82 Cal. 119, 23 Pac. Rep. 35; Doty v. O'Neill, 95 Cal. 244, 30 Pac. Rep. 526; People v. Turcott, 65 Cal. 126, 3 Pac. Rep. 461. Tested by this rule, we do not think the particular instruction complained of could possibly have misled the jury. The second instruction on the part of plaintiff was in part as follows: "The jury are instructed that in determining the question of negligence in this case they should take into consideration the situation and conduct of both parties at the time of the alleged injury as disclosed by the evidence; and if the jury believe from the evidence that the injury complained of was caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants, as charged in the complaint, and the plaintiff acted as was reasonably to be expected of a person of ordinary care and prudence in the situation in which she found herself placed, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover." The fourth, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh instructions asked by plaintiff all contained similar expressions, indicating the right of plaintiff to a recovery, to be subject to the exercise on her part of such reasonable care as a person of ordinary judgment and prudence would exercise under like circumstances. The second instruction, given by the court at the request of defendant, was as follows: "Second. The court instructs the jury that if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff jumped from the street car after it had passed from a place of danger, or apparent danger, to a place of safety, and that a person of ordinary intelligence under like circumstances would have known that the danger was passed, and would not have jumped from the car at the time plaintiff did, you should find for the defendant." It will thus be seen that the jury were over and over again instructed in clear and explicit language that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover unless she was at the time of the accident herself exercising ordinary care to avoid the injury of which she complained, and it is not reasonable to suppose that the jury was misled to the prejudice of appellant because the first instruction omitted to say anything upon the subject of the effect of contributory negligence upon plaintiff's right of recovery. We find no substantial error in the record. Judgment and order affirmed.

MULKEY v. MULKEY. (No. 18,046.)

DIVORCE—SETTING ASIDE DECREE.

Code Civil Proc. § 473, provides that the court may, after notice to the adverse party, on such terms as may be just, relieve a party from a judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. Defendant suffered a default in a suit for divorce for adultery, brought by her husband, who was awarded the custody of the children and the entire community property. She applied to vacate the judgment under said section, and, by affidavit annexed, swore that her husband told her said suit would be brought for desertion. Held that, in view of the harshness of the judgment, the court should have set it aside, whether defendant had colluded with, or had been deceived by, her husband; her application and affidavit showing sufficiently the grounds of her proposed answer.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; G. G. Clough, Judge.

Action by David E. Mulkey against Sarah N. Mulkey for a divorce. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant's motion to set aside judgment denied. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Spencer & Raker, for appellant. D. W. Jenks and J. D. Goodwin, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, J. The transcript in this case contains two appeals,—one from the judgment decreeing to plaintiff a divorce on the ground of adultery; the other, from an order denying defendant's motion to vacate and set aside the judgment. The complaint was filed April 6, 1891, and the defendant served with process April 8, 1891. On the 21st day of April, 1891, the defendant having failed to appear and answer, default was duly entered against her, and on the 23d day of April, 1891, the court, upon the testimony taken before it, found that all the allegations of the complaint were true, and thereupon judgment was accordingly entered, granting to plaintiff a divorce from the defendant on the ground stated. The judgment awarded to plaintiff the four minor children, three of whom were girls, the eldest being about eight years of age, and assigned to plaintiff all of the community property. The motion was made on all the grounds enumerated in section 473, Code Civil Proc., and upon the further ground of the disqualification of the presiding judge, and was heard on notice and affidavits of the defendant and others, including one of merits, and was resisted by opposing affidavits.

An affidavit of merits on grounds of public policy has no place in a proceeding of this character. McBlain v. McBlain, 77 Cal. 507, 20 Pac. Rep. 61. The motion should have been heard and determined alone upon the grounds stated in the notice and affidavits. The facts stated in the affidavit of defendant show either collusion between the parties, or that the defendant was grossly misled and deceived by her husband as to the ground of the proposed action; he having informed her, as she states, that it would be brought on the ground of desertion. In either case the court should have been prompt to set aside the judgment and allow the defendant to answer, so that the case might be heard and determined on its merits. The judgment is a harsh one, and fearful in its consequences. It deprives the defendant, among other things, of children, home, property, and character. To justify such a judgment, the evidence should always be clear and convincing; and when obtained in an action of this character, under circumstances such as are disclosed by the record in this case, it should, upon a proper application, made by the defendant for that purpose, be vacated without hesitation, and a much slighter showing than the one here made would be amply sufficient for the purpose. The affidavit of the defendant, in so far as it purports to be an affidavit of merits, was, as we have stated, immaterial; but in this case, although the practice is not to be commended, it serves the purpose of a proposed answer by specifically denying the material allegations of the complaint, thereby showing what the answer would be if permitted to be filed. This is a sufficient reply to respondent's claim that no draft of any proposed answer accompanied the application. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to vacate and set aside the judgment, and to allow the defendant to answer within a reasonable time.

LIQUIDATED DAMAGES—CONTRACT FOR SALE OF LAND.

Plaintiff agreed with defendant to buy certain land, and pay "$1,000 cash deposit," and, on or before a certain date, $2,500, and then to give a mortgage back for $3,320; if plaintiff should fail to pay the $2,500 on said date, the contract to be void as to plaintiff, and the $1,000 to be retained by defendant as liquidated damages. Plaintiff did not pay on said date, but wrote defendant, a week later, explaining why he had not been able to do so, saying that he was now ready, and that a draft on him for $2,500 would be honored, and the mortgage executed. Defendant did not answer said letter, and refused to fulfill the contract, or return the deposit. Held that, having suffered no actual damages by plaintiff's default, he was liable for the whole deposit, in view of Civil Code, §§ 1670, 1671, which forbid contracts for liquidated damages for breach of an obligation unless, from the nature of the case, it would be impracticable to fix the actual damage.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; William O. Minor, Judge. Action by George Easton against A. L. Cressey for money had and received. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stonesifer & Minor, for appellants. Van Ness & Roche and W. H. Hatton, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment against him in favor of plaintiff for $1,000, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The facts found by the court are substantially as follows: On September 7, 1887, the parties made a written agreement by which the appellant, Cressey, agreed to sell to respondent, Easton, a certain piece of land, upon these terms: Easton was to pay "one thousand dollars cash deposit," and on or before November 1, 1887, was to pay $2,500, and was also, on said last-named day, to execute a mortgage upon the land to Cressey for $3,320. Then Cressey was to convey the land to Easton. It was provided in the agreement that, if Easton should fail to pay the $2,500 on November 1st, "then this contract shall be void, so far as said Easton is concerned," and that the $1,000 cash should be retained by Cressey as "liquidated damages." Easton paid the $1,000 when the contract was made, but did not pay the $2,500 on November 1st, because, as he says, Cressey was absent from home. Cressey, however, had left a deed conveying the land to Easton in the Bank of Modesto, at the city of Modesto, of which bank Cressey was president, to be delivered to Easton upon payment that day of the $2,500. But, on November 8th, Easton, who lived at San Francisco, wrote to Cressey, telling him the reason why he had not paid the money on the 1st; that he was ready to settle according to the terms of the contract; and that a draft on him for the amount would be promptly honored, and the mortgage executed. Cressey received this letter, but made no reply. Easton wrote him again to the same effect on November 28th, but Cressey did not answer the letter. The court finds that on November 1, 1887, Easton was, and ever since has been, "ready, able, willing, and anxious" to make said payment of $2,500, and execute said mortgage, and that Cressey "has at all times since November 8, 1887, refused to carry out the terms of the contract between the parties, or to perform any" of its covenants or conditions. No part of the $1,000 has been repaid, and Cressey has not been damaged by any act or omission of Easton in the premises. This action was brought by Easton to recover the said "one thousand dollars' cash deposit."

The foregoing findings are, we think, warranted by the evidence; and, that being so, the judgment is right. The provision in the contract for liquidated damages was void, under sections 1670 and 1671 of the Civil Code, (Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 25 Pac. Rep. 749;) and the rule governing the case at bar is "that, when a contract of sale and purchase of lands is abandoned or rescinded by the parties, the vendee, though in default, may recover back installments paid of the purchase money, less the actual damage to the vendor, occasioned by his breach of contract," (Phelps v. Brown, 95 Cal. 572, 30 Pac. Rep. 774; Drew v. Pedlar, supra.) And it was clear that appellant did not suffer any actual damage from the failure of respondent to pay the $2,500 on the very day named in the contract. Appellant introduced evidence tending to show a depreciation in the market value of the land, the removal by him of a cloud on the title, etc.; but we cannot see of what importance these matters were, when respondent was willing, able, and anxious to take the land, and pay the contract price. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MORPHY. (No. 20,981.)

FALSE PRETENSES—REPRESENTATIONS BY SALESMAN—CHEAPNESS OF PRICES.

A prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses cannot be maintained by reason of representations by a traveling salesman to a customer as to the importance of the house he represented, and the cheapness of its prices compared with others, where the goods sold are as represented.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; William O. Minor, Judge.

C. Morphy was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and appeals. Reversed.

L. J. Maddux and T. S. O'Donnell, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

TEMPLE, C. This is a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, and the defendant, having been convicted, appeals from the judgment.

The indictment was demurred to on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, and, after conviction, a motion in arrest of judgment was made on the same grounds. The indictment charges that defendant, "with intent to defraud one John F. Copeland of his personal property, did unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly falsely pretend and represent to the said John F. Copeland that he, the said C. Morphy, did then and there represent a first-class wholesale grocery firm in the city of San Francisco; that he had no rent to pay and no expenses to pay, and that he could and would then and there sell and deliver groceries to the said John F. Copeland at the town of Hickman, in said Stanislaus county, twenty-five per cent. cheaper than they could be purchased in Modesto, Oakdale, or Stockton, and that all groceries sold by him would be of first-class quality and of full weight and quantity; and the said John F. Copeland, then and there believing said false pretenses and representations so made as aforesaid by the said C. Morphy to be true, was thereby induced to, and did then and there, purchase a bill of groceries from the said C. Morphy, and pay to him therefor the sum of one hundred and eighty-four and 50-100 dollars, the said amount being then and there fifty dollars and over more than the same bill of groceries could then and there have been purchased for in Modesto, Oakdale, or Stockton." The indictment then proceeds, restating each representation, to charge that it was false, and that the defendant knew it; that said Morphy could not and would not sell or deliver groceries at the town of Hickman cheaper than they could be purchased at Stockton, Oakdale, or Modesto; that all groceries sold by him would not be first-class, or of full weight or quantity; that said Morphy then well knew that all and each of said representations were then and there wholly false and untrue; "and the said C. Morphy did then and there unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly, by reason of said false pretenses and representations aforesaid, deceive the said John F. Copeland, and thereby fraudulently obtain from him, the said John F. Copeland, fifty dollars and over, the personal property of the said Copeland, more than the said Copeland would otherwise have paid the said C. Morphy for the bill of groceries aforesaid."

The demurrer should have been sustained. It is very true that it might amount to false pretenses, within the statute, to falsely and fraudulently represent that one represented a prominent business house in San Francisco for the purpose of obtaining goods or money from another. This, however, is not that case. The representation was made simply by way of an argument to prove that he could sell goods cheaper than they could be bought at Stockton, Oakdale, or Modesto. This representation, and the statement that he had no rent to pay, were designed to induce his intended customer to rely upon his promise that he could and would sell cheaper than the goods could be bought for elsewhere, and it was evidently this promise which induced the prosecutor to deal with him; and the injury was, not that goods or money was obtained without consideration, but that the promise was not kept, and, in fact, the goods could have been obtained cheaper at other places. It does not appear from the indictment that the goods were not all that they were represented to be, as to character, quality, and quantity, or that they were not sold at a fair price. It may be conceded that representations calculated to make intending purchasers believe that a particular merchant can and will sell goods cheaper than others, when it is not so, do not rank very high in the scale of morality; but, if the representations here are criminal false pretenses, a crime is paraded in numerous show windows in every city. Perhaps this is not an argument of a very high order, but it does tend to prove that such "tricks of the trade" were not intended to be included in the statute, where there is no false representation as to the character, quality, or quantity of the merchandise. Customers are presumed to have some knowledge of the value of what they purchase, and can always inquire, before purchasing, as to market values. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the court directed to sustain the demurrer.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the court is directed to sustain the demurrer.

ROSENTHAL et al. v. MATHEWS. (No. 18,048.)

JUDGMENT—DESCRIPTION OF LAND—CERTAINTY.

A judgment for the recovery of land entered in September, 1891, described a certain tract, but excepted from its effect such parts "as were sown to grain by the defendant during the fall of 1890 and the winter of 1891." Held, that the term "winter of 1891" referred to the winter of 1890-91, and the description is prima facie sufficient to identify the land excepted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by Joseph Rosenthal and others against W. P. Mathews. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jackson Hatch, for appellant. P. H. Coffman, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover possession of a large tract of land situate in the county of Tehama, and the value of the rents and profits thereof, alleged to be $1,500. The answer of the defendant admits the plaintiffs' ownership of the land, and the withholding of the possession thereof by defendant, but alleges that he was entitled to the possession by a lease from the plaintiffs, and denies that the rents or profits were of any value. The action was tried by the court, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for the possession of the land, except a portion thereof described in the judgment, and for $500 as the estimated value of the rents and profits of that portion of the land wrongfully withheld. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. On the appeal from the judgment the appellant contends that the description of that part of the land excepted from the operation of the judgment is so indefinite and uncertain that neither the land excepted nor that recovered can be identified thereby, and therefore the judgment is void. It is not denied that the demanded premises are definitely and correctly described in the complaint. The judgment describes the land as it is described in the complaint, but excepts from its effect such parts of the land described "as were sown to grain by the defendant during the fall of 1890 and the winter of 1891." As the judgment was entered September 8, 1891, the words "winter of 1891" must be understood to mean the winter expiring in 1891; and the lands excepted are such parts as had been sown to grain by defendant during the fall of 1890 and the winter immediately following,—the winter of 1890 and 1891,—all before the date of the judgment. This is made perfectly plain by the context, and gives appropriate effect to all the words of the exception; for, while no winter is wholly of any one year of our Lord, two-thirds of the winter immediately prior to the judgment was of the year A. D. 1891. It is contended, however, that conceding the exception to be certain as to the winter intended, still, the description is insufficient to identify the land excepted. Prima facie the description appears to be sufficient, and no reason why it cannot be applied so as to identify the excepted land is suggested. The boundary lines of the land sown to grain by defendant during the fall of 1890 and the following winter must have been distinctly apparent on the ground from the time the grain was sown until some time after it was harvested; and if the marks by which such boundary lines were designated were subsequently removed or destroyed, their original location may be proved by extraneous evidence, as in cases of the removal or destruction of stakes or other monuments called for in deeds and patents. De Sepulveda v. Baugh, 74 Cal. 468, 16 Pac. Rep. 223. In the case at bar the question is whether or not the description contained in the judgment is sufficient to identify the land. In this it differs from the question involved and discussed in Crosby v. Dowd, 61 Cal. 557, and in De Sepulveda v. Baugh, supra, in which the objection to the description was that it was not contained in the judgment, but in some other document, map, or record referred to in the judgment, and not appearing even in the judgment roll.

2. The points that the findings do not support the judgment, and that the evidence does not justify the finding that the value of the rents and profits was $500, rest largely upon the assumption that the description of the land excepted from the operation of the judgment does not distinguish it from the land recovered. The evidence is amply sufficient to justify the finding as to the value of the rents and profits, and the findings support the judgment.

3. It is not made to appear that the court erred in admitting or excluding evidence. As to these points, counsel merely refers to his exceptions. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

CEDERBERG v. ROBISON. (No. 18,100.)

DAMAGES—BREACH OF HARVESTING CONTRACT.

In an action for breach of a contract whereby plaintiff was to harvest defendant's grain, it appeared that plaintiff had spent several days in preparing to perform, hauling horse feed and provisions for his men, with two four-horse teams and men in charge; that he was discharged the third day of harvesting; that he was using 24 horses, 6 of them hired, and his own machine, worth $2,000; that after said discharge his men, teams, and machine lay idle a week before he could obtain other work for them. Held, that a verdict for $400 actual damages was sustained by the evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; Wheaton A. Gray, Judge.

Action by Cederberg against Robison for damages for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Bradley & Farnsworth, for appellant. Power & Alford and R. Irwin, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff agreed with the defendant to harvest about 1,200 acres of grain, for which the defendant was to pay him at the rate of two dollars per acre. After he had harvested 65 acres a dispute arose between them concerning the terms of the agreement, the defendant claiming that the plaintiff was to take certain mules at an agreed valuation of $1,000 in part payment on the contract, for which he wished him to give his promissory note, and the defendant claiming that he had not so agreed; and, upon his refusing to execute the note, defendant refused to allow him to complete the harvesting. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the breach of the aforesaid contract. At the trial the jury rendered a verdict in his favor for $400, and the defendant has appealed.

Whether the agreement between the parties was as claimed by the defendant was sharply contested at the trial, and the verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiff upon this conflicting evidence shows that they found against his claim, and is conclusive upon the point. We are not called upon to determine whether the rule of damages, as laid down in Utter v. Chapman, 38 Cal. 662, 43 Cal. 279, is applicable in the present case. The action was tried in the court below upon the theory that if, after the contract had been wrongfully terminated, the plaintiff had obtained other employment of a similar character, and his earnings during the time he was so employed were equal to those which he would have received had he completed the contract with the defendant, he did not to that extent suffer any damage, and, as the plaintiff has not appealed, the correctness of that rule is not involved herein. The appeal of the defendant is based upon his proposition that the evidence before the jury did not show that the plaintiff had suffered damage to the extent of $400. We cannot determine from the record what items the jury took into account in determining this amount of damage, but, as no exception was taken to the instructions of the court, the judgment upon the verdict must stand, if there was evidence before the jury of sufficient damage to justify its finding. It appears that, after making the agreement with the defendant, the plaintiff was engaged for several days in making preparations for the performance of the contract, hauling hay and barley with which to feed his horses while engaged in the harvesting, and provisions for the men in his employ during that time; that in doing this he was compelled to employ two teams of four horses each for several days, with the men necessary to attend them and to care for the hauling; that he began the work of harvesting on the 3d day of June, and was discharged on the 5th, and that his men and horses and harvesting machine remained idle from that date until the 12th of June, when he began similar work upon another field, for which he received a compensation equivalent in amount to that which he would have had for the time he was so engaged had he continued to complete his contract with the defendant; that while he was engaged in the work for the defendant he employed 24 horses, 6 of which he hired for that purpose, and 18 of which were his own; that he was also the owner of the harvester used by him, and for which he had paid $2,000. The record does not show that there was presented to the jury any evidence of the value of the services rendered by the plaintiff and the teams employed by him in hauling the hay and barley for the purpose of getting ready to do the harvesting, or the expense to which the plaintiff was subjected during the time between his discharge by the defendant and his employment upon the other field; but that in each of these matters he was subjected to some expense required no evidence, and it may be assumed that the jury were familiar with such work, and that from their own knowledge and experience they were capable of estimating the value of these services, and the expenses thus necessarily incurred; and in such a case, unless it should appear that the amount allowed therefor is excessive, the verdict of a jury should not be disturbed. Juries are in many cases permitted to exercise their individual judgments as to values upon subjects presumptively within their own knowledge, which they have acquired through experience or observation, and the objection that no evidence was presented before them upon such subjects is insufficient to defeat their verdict.

ing from contract the measure of damages, except where otherwise expressly provided by this Code, is the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which in the ordinary course of things would be likely to result therefrom." When a contract of employment like the present has been wrongfully terminated by the employer, the detriment sustained by the other party includes the necessary expenditures incurred by him in making preparations for performing the contract, sometimes called the "outlay," and the expenses incurred by him while engaged in its performance, up to the time of its termination. If, in addition to the losses thus actually incurred by him, he is subjected to additional expenses after the termination of his employment, that grow out of his preparation for the work, or which result from his enforced idleness, these are necessarily a part of the injury he has sustained by reason of his employer's breach of the contract. If he had completed the contract, the measure of his recovery would be the contract price. This contract price would include his outlay and cost of performance, and also the direct profits which he would realize from its performance. These profits would represent the difference between his actual expenditures and the contract price, and would include compensation for his own labor and the use or rental value of whatever property of his own was employed in performing the contract. If, however, he is prevented by the other party from completing the contract, and seeks to recover damages therefor, his measure of recovery must be determined by the circumstances of each case. He should not be allowed the entire contract price for that portion of the work completed by him, and also his outlay and cost of performance, as that would give him, for the work actually done, the contract price therefor, and also all of his expenses in doing the work and preparing therefor; but, in addition to the expenses incurred by him for outlay and the cost of performance, he should be allowed the reasonable value of his own services and of the use of his property, as a part of the damages sustained by him, and also a portion of the profits which he would have made under the contract, since in each of these elements he has sustained damage. So many elements enter into a calculation of profits that no rule can be formulated for determining what portion of those which are anticipated for the whole contract shall be allowed when the contract is not completed; but this amount must be left to the wise discretion of an intelligent jury, according to the circumstances of each case. If the contract is nearly completed, the difference between the contract price and the original outlay and cost of performance would be more controlling in determining this question than if the contractor had only entered upon the performance; since in the former case the cost of completing the work could be readily ascertained, whereas, in the other, the uncertainty of this cost and the risk to be encountered would vary with the time required for its completion. "The profits and losses must be determined according to the circumstances of the case and the subject-matter of the contract. The reasonable expenditures already incurred, the unavoidable losses incident to stoppage, the progress attained, the unfinished part and the probable cost of its completion, the whole contract price and the estimated pecuniary result, favorable or unfavorable to him, had he been permitted or required to go on and complete his contract, may be taken into consideration,"—citing cases. Behan v. U. S., 18 Ct. Cl. 687, approved by the supreme court on appeal, 110 U. S. 338, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 81. The difficulty in any case is not to determine whether the loss of profits upon his contract constitutes a part of his damage, as the cases all admit that this is an element which enters into his damage, but to determine what portion of the profits he has lost by the breach of his contract. If this amount can be accurately ascertained, the plaintiff is entitled thereto, but he is not to be deprived of all profits because they are not susceptible of exact measurement.

In consideration of the foregoing rules, we cannot say that the evidence before the jury was insufficient to justify its verdict. The court before which the case was tried approved the verdict by its action in denying a new trial, and the burden is upon appellant to show that error has been committed. It is not sufficient to say that the jury might have found otherwise, or that a verdict for a less amount would have been consistent with the evidence. It must appear from the evidence itself that the verdict cannot be sustained. "It does not lie in the mouth of the party who has voluntarily and wrongfully put an end to the contract to say that the party injured has not been damaged, at least to the amount of what he has been induced fairly and in good faith to lay out and expend, including his own services, unless he can show that the expenses of the party injured have been extravagant and unnecessary for the purpose of carrying out the contract. * * *

The party who voluntarily and wrongfully puts an end to a contract, and prevents the other party from performing it, is estopped from denying that the injured party has not been damaged to the extent of his actual loss and outlay, fairly incurred." U. S. v. Behan, 110 U. S. 338, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 81. In addition to the actual loss and outlay incurred in making preparations for the contract, the loss necessarily incurred by the plaintiff during the time that he remained idle after the termination of the contract is an element of actual expense; and the delinquent defendant is not entitled to have a Jury scrutinize too closely the items of expense caused by his own faithlessness, or to receive the advantage of a part performance of his contract without making a reasonable compensation therefor. Certain exceptions were taken to the rulings of the court in admitting evidence during the trial, but none of these rulings were of such a character as to affect the result. The testimony respecting the authority of Niswander to bind the defendant was received, subject to be afterwards struck out on motion of the defendant, but, as no motion of that character was made, he must be deemed to have acquiesced in its remaining before the jury. The judgment and order are affirmed.

HITCHCOCK v. CARUTHERS et al. (No. 18,158.)

JUDGMENT—REVIVAL—SURETIES ON STAY BOND.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 708, provides that if the purchaser of property at sheriff's sale fail to recover possession "because the property sold was not subject to execution and sale," the court must, after notice, and on motion of such purchaser, revive the original judgment in his name for the amount paid. A judgment against a party and the sureties on his supersedeas bond was paid partly in cash and partly by execution against the principal debtor, and was satisfied of record. Said debtor's wife then sued, and recovered from the purchaser the property sold, as being hers, and not her husband's, at the time of the levy and sale. Held, that the purchaser was entitled to relief under said statute against both principal and sureties.

2. Though sureties on a supersedeas bond are not actors in the suit, nor entitled to notice of every step in the proceedings, yet, after judgment entered against them, they are as much judgment debtors as the principal, and the judgment, once satisfied of record, cannot be revived against them without notice to them as well as to the principal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Appeal by William A. Caruthers and others, sureties on his supersedeas bond, from an order reviving the judgment rendered against them in the suit of Ida Hitchcock against said Caruthers in favor of H. H. Welsh, purchaser at the execution sale under said judgment in the sum of $675. Affirmed as to Caruthers, and reversed as to the others.

J. P. Meux, for appellants. Church & Cory, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant Caruthers appealed from a judgment rendered against him for the sum of $7,500, and gave to the plaintiff an undertaking, with the other appellants herein as sureties, to stay the execution of the judgment pending the appeal. The judgment was affirmed in this court, (23 Pac. Rep. 48,) and after the filing of the remittitur in the court below judgment was entered against the sureties in the undertaking in accordance with the provisions of section 942, Code Civil Proc. Execution was thereupon issued upon the judgment against the defendant, under which the sheriff levied upon certain personal property in the possession of the defendant, and sold the same to the respondent, who had become the assignee of the judgment; and the proceeds were credited upon the judgment. The balance of the judgment was paid in money by the defendant, and thereupon the plaintiff satisfied of record the judgment against the defendant, and also the judgment against the sureties. After these judgments had been thus satisfied, the wife of the defendant brought an action against the respondent for the recovery of the property purchased by him at the sale, and in that action it was adjudged that at the time of the levy and sale the property was not the property of the defendant, but belonged to his wife, and the property was taken from the respondent, and delivered to the owner. Thereupon, upon motion of the respondent, the court made an order under the provisions of section 708, Code Civil Proc., reviving the judgment in his favor for the sum of $675, the amount in which the judgment had been credited for the property lost by him in the above action, and afterwards ordered that judgment for the same amount be entered against the sureties. This last order was made upon notice thereof to the attorney for the defendant, but no notice thereof was given to the sureties, or either of them.

The defendant has appealed from the judgment so revived against him, and the sureties from the judgment entered against them.

Section 708, Code Civil Proc., provides that, "If the purchaser of property at sheriff's sale, or his successor in interest, fail to recover possession in consequence of irregularity in the proceedings concerning the sale, or because the property sold was not subject to execution and sale, the court having jurisdiction thereof must, after notice and on motion of such party in interest or his attorney, revive the original judgment in the name of the petitioner, for the amount paid by such purchaser at the sale," etc. In Cross v. Zane, 47 Cal. 602, it was held that, as this section is remedial in its character, it is to be liberally construed, and that, if the property sold was not the property of the defendant in the execution, it amounted to a sale of property not subject to execution and sale within the intent of the statute; and upon the principles of that case it must be held that, if the purchaser lose the possession of the property after its purchase, because it was not the property of the defendant in the execution, he is entitled to the remedies afforded by the act. In Meredit v. Association, 60 Cal. 617, it was held that upon a motion to enter judgment against the sureties on their undertaking to stay execution pending the appeal provided for by section 942, no notice to them is necessary; that by their stipulation in the undertaking they have voluntarily made themselves parties to the action, and that the court has acquired a jurisdiction over them which it retains until the enforcement of any judgment recoverable against them as parties to the action. Although, by entering into the undertaking, they have been brought under the jurisdiction of the court, they have not thereby been made actors in the litigation, or entitled to any part in its conduct. The defendant, for whom they have guaranteed the payment of the judgment, is still entitled to the conduct of his defense, and the party to whom they have given the undertaking is not required to give them notice of any steps in procedure to be taken against the defendant, but they are bound equally with him by any order which may be made between the real parties in the action. They are liable upon their undertaking, even though the appeal is dismissed by his consent. Chase v. Beraud, 29 Cal. 138. Their obligation to pay the judgment in case of his default is absolute, and extends until the judgment shall have been actually paid. Any performance by the defendant that will discharge the judgment against him will operate as a discharge against them, and any act of the plaintiff that will release the defendant from the judgment will also release them, but, so long as the plaintiff has the right to enforce the judgment against the defendant, he is entitled to enforce their obligation. It would not be contended that the sureties would be discharged if the defendant had procured a satisfaction of the judgment through some mistake, as by an error in making payment of the amount due upon the judgment, or by a payment in money which proved to be counterfeit, or had knowingly turned over to the plaintiff in satisfaction of the judgment property belonging to another, which the plaintiff had afterwards been compelled to surrender to the real owner. The same grounds which would prevent the defendant from insisting upon such a transaction as a discharge of his obligation would prevent them from insisting that they were discharged, and it would be immaterial that a formal satisfaction of the judgment had been placed on record. Their obligation is that the appellant will pay the amount of the judgment against him, and the terms of this obligation are to be interpreted by the same rules as are the terms of any other contract. Civil Code, § 2837. In the present case the defendant has not paid the judgment, and the court has found that under the provisions of section 708, Code Civil Proc., he is not entitled to the benefit of the satisfaction thereof that had been given. The property which was taken from him for the purpose of satisfying the judgment, and to the taking of which he does not appear to have objected, was not his property, and consequently neither he nor the sureties have parted with any right or advantage in consideration of the satisfaction, and there is no principle of morals or rule in equity by which the sureties can claim the benefit of the formal satisfaction given in consideration of the receipt of that property.

The judgment against the sureties must, however, be reversed, for the reason that it was entered without any notice to them. When the plaintiff caused the judgment to be entered against them in accordance with their stipulation in the undertaking he assumed the same obligations towards them in reference to this judgment as rest upon any other judgment creditor. After he had satisfied it against them the court was not authorized to set aside this satisfaction or to revive the judgment without giving them an opportunity to be heard. They should have been allowed to present any matter that had occurred subsequent to the entry of the original judgment against them which the court might deem sufficient to authorize a denial of the plaintiff's motion. If the judgment against the defendant had not in fact been paid, their obligation would not have been performed, and the mere fact of its satisfaction under such circumstances as would authorize the court to set it aside as against the defendant would be no defense to a motion by the plaintiff to set it aside as against them. They were, however, entitled to contest this fact, and to contest the insufficiency of the circumstances under which the satisfaction had been made, and the decision of the court in the proceeding between the plaintiff and the defendant would not be conclusive upon them. The court should not order a new judgment to be entered against them without giving them the same opportunity to be heard as by section 708 the judgment debtor is himself entitled to receive. If, however, upon such hearing, the court should be satisfied that the original satisfaction had been entered inadvertently, or under such circumstances as required it to be set aside, it should make an order to that effect; and it might at the same time designate the amount for which the judgment should be permitted to stand. The judgment against the defendant is affirmed, and the judgment against the sureties is reversed, with leave to the petitioner to take such further proceedings against them as he may be advised.

PACKER et al. v. DORAY et al. (No. 18,105.) (Supreme Court of California. Oct. 14, 1893.)

NEW TRIAL—AMENDMENT OF NOTICE—QUIETING TITLE.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 659, subd. 4, provides that where a motion for a new trial is made on the minutes of the court; and errors of law are relied on, the notice of motion must specify the errors relied on, and "if the notice do not contain the specifications * * * the motion must be denied." Held that, where the notice does not contain the required specification, it is radically defective, and cannot be amended by adding new specifications after the time for filing it has expired, and if it is so amended, by leave of the trial court, after such time has expired, the specifications will not be considered on appeal.

2. Where defendant in an action to quiet title disclaims as to part of the land, it is not error for the court to dismiss the action as to such part, instead of giving plaintiff judgment therefor, as such judgment would be merely formal, under Code Civil Proc. § 739, which provides that "if the defendant in such action disclaims in his answer any interest or estate in the property * * * the plaintiff cannot recover costs."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sierra county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Action by W. S. Packer and others against Phil Doray and others to quiet title. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. M. Walling, Tiley L. Ford, and Goodwin & Goodwin, for appellants. F. D. Soward and Frank R. Wehe, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to quiet the plaintiffs' title to certain tailing mining claims, called the "Alturas Company's Mining Claims," situate in Slate creek, and partly in Sierra county and partly in Plumas county. The claims described extend up and down the creek about 26,000 feet, and contain an area of about 112 acres. The defendants deny that the plaintiffs are, or ever were, the owners or in possession of that portion of the claims described, commencing at the upper end thereof, and extending down the creek about 10,000 feet; and they allege that as to such portion of the claims they are, and were at the time of the commencement of the action, and long prior thereto, the owners, and in possession thereof; and, as to the balance of the claims described in the complaint, they disclaim having or claiming any estate or interest in or to the same. The case was tried by the court and the findings were that neither the plaintiffs, nor either of them, nor their grantors or predecessors, ever owned or possessed, or were entitled to the possession of, the mining ground described in the answers of defendants, and that at the time of the commencement of the action the defendants were the owners of, and in the actual possession of, all the mining ground described in their answers, and claimed by them. Judgment was accordingly entered that the plaintiffs take nothing, that their action be dismissed, and that defendants recover their costs. From this judgment, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, the plaintiffs appeal.

1. The principal contention of appellants is that the findings were not justified by the evidence, and hence that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. The evidence brought up in the transcript is evidently stated as briefly as possible, and still it covers about 100 printed pages. It relates to sundry attempted locations; to the customs of miners; to work done on different portions of the ground, commencing as early as 1855; and to numerous transfers of interests claimed to have been acquired under such locations. To state the facts in detail would require much space, and subserve no useful purpose. In our opinion, it is enough to say that, while there was some conflict, there was evidence clearly tending to justify and support the findings, and hence that the judgment cannot be reversed on this ground.

2. It is urged that numerous errors of law were committed by the court during the progress of the trial, which call for a reversal of the judgment. The notice of intention to move for a new trial stated that it would be made upon the minutes of the court, and it was so made. The notice specified the particulars in which the evidence was alleged to be insufficient to justify the verdict, but contained no specifications of errors of law. Subsequently, and after the time for giving the notice had elapsed, the plaintiffs, by leave of the court, amended their notice by adding thereto specifications of the errors of law now complained of. The motion was denied, and thereafter a statement of the case was prepared and settled. Section 659, subd. 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure, provides: "When the motion is to be made upon the minutes of the court, and the ground of the motion is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision, the notice of motion must specify the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient; and, if the ground of the motion be errors in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by the moving party, the notice must specify the particular errors upon which the party will rely. If the notice do not contain the specifications here indicated, when the motion is made on the minutes of the court, the motion must be denied." The notice given was radically defective, so far as regards the specifications of error, and after the time for filing it had elapsed the moving parties had no right to amend it by adding the new specifications. Cooney v. Furlong, 66 Cal. 520, 6 Pac. Rep. 388; Little v. Jacks, 67 Cal. 165, 7 Pac. Rep. 449. This being so, the alleged errors cannot be considered. If, however, it was otherwise, the same result must be reached, since we are unable to see any material error in the rulings complained of.

3. It is further urged that the plaintiffs were entitled to have their title quieted as to all that part of the premises described in their complaint in which the defendants disclaimed having any estate or interest, and that the court, therefore, erred in dismissing the action. Section 739 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "If the defendant in such action [action to quiet title] disclaim in his answer any interest or estate in the property, or suffer judgment to be taken against him without answer, the plaintiff cannot recover costs." If, then, judgment had been entered, quieting the plaintiffs' title to the disclaimed portion of the ground, it would have been merely formal, and without costs. Under these circumstances, we fail to see that plaintiffs were aggrieved by the judgment entered. The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GREENE. (No. 21,022.)

CRIMINAL LAW—FORMER JEOPARDY.

On the second trial of a criminal case, the record of the first trial, showing that the jury had been discharged on their statement that they could not agree, after deliberating only six hours, will not support a plea of former jeopardy, as Pen. Code, § 1140, providing that the jury may be discharged "at the expiration of such time as the court may deem proper," if "it satisfactorily appears that there is no probability that the jury can agree," does not require the record to show that it satisfactorily appeared to the judge that there was no such probability.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Francisco county; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

Greene was convicted of embezzlement, and appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. B. Darwin, for appellant. W. S. Barnes, Dist. Atty., and W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PATERSON, J. The defendant was tried upon an information charging him with embezzlement. After deliberating six hours, the jury returned into court, and stated to the judge that they were unable to agree upon a verdict, whereupon they were discharged. When the case came on for trial again, the defendant interposed the pleas of former jeopardy and former acquittal, and in support thereof introduced in evidence the record showing that he had been once before tried on the same information, and that the jury had been discharged on their statement that they could not agree, after deliberating only six hours. The court instructed the jury that the evidence offered was insufficient to sustain either of said pleas. It is now claimed that this instruction was erroneous, as the record must show that it satisfactorily appeared to the judge there was no reasonable probability the jury could agree. The statute upon which the court acted authorizes the discharge of the jury after the cause has been submitted to them "at the expiration of such time as the court may deem proper," if "it satisfactorily appears that there is no probability that the jury can agree." Pen. Code, § 1140. The reasons upon which the court deems it proper to discharge the jury are not required to be placed on record. It is sufficient that it shows the jury were unable to agree. The judge is not bound to take as final the statement of the jury that they cannot agree upon a verdict, but, when such a statement is made, the court below, familiar with the nature of the evidence, and probably the temperaments of the men who compose the jury, is better qualified to say whether there is a reasonable probability of an agreement than the appellate court. Certainly, the latter ought not to interfere with the ruling, except in cases of clear abuse of discretion. People v. Smalling, 94 Cal. 115, 29 Pac. Rep. 421. Judgment and order affirmed.

JACOBS v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (No. 15,377.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—BOARD OF SUPERVISORS—CONSTITUTIONAL CONTROL OF WATER RATES—ORDINANCES—APPROVAL BY MAYOR—MANDAMUS TO MUNICIPAL BOARD—DISCRETIONARY ACTS.

1. Const. art. 14, § 1, providing that water rates "shall be fixed annually by the board of supervisors or other governing body of such city and county, by ordinance or otherwise, in the manner that other ordinances or legislative acts or resolutions are passed by such body," grants to the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco the sole power to fix the water rates in such city and county.

2. The fixing of water rates requires the exercise of discretion and judgment, and, where the board has exercised its discretion by passing an order, it cannot be compelled by mandamus to change its judgment, or to take further action on the order.

3. The consolidation act of 1856, § 68, requiring certain ordinances of the board of supervisors to be presented to the mayor for approval before they take effect, does not make the mayor a member of the board of supervisors, as a "governing body."

4. The constitutional requirement that an ordinance fixing water rates should be passed by the board "in the manner that other ordinances or legislative acts or resolutions are passed by such body" does not render the mayor's approval of the ordinance necessary to its validity, as such ordinance is not included among those required by consolidation act, § 68, to be presented to the mayor for approval.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Proceeding in mandamus by Julius Jacobs to compel the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to act on an order fixing water rates, and which had been vetoed by the mayor. Judgment for petitioner. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

William F. Herrin, John Currey, Garber, Boalt & Bishop, Pillsbury, Blanding & Hayne, and H. S. Foote, for appellants. Pierson & Mitchell and Arthur Rogers, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. On March 27, 1893, the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco passed an order—designated as “Order No. 2,622”—fixing the rates of compensation to be collected by any person or corporation furnishing water for family uses, for private persons, and for municipal and public purposes during the year commencing July 1, 1893, pursuant to section 1 of article 14 of the state constitution. The clerk of said board of supervisors presented said order to the mayor of said city and county, who refused to approve the same; and on April 7, 1893, he returned it to the board with a statement in writing of his objections thereto, showing that his views differed widely from those of the board upon the subject of proper water rates. At the first meeting of the board thereafter, viz. April 10th, the said board refused to enter the said objections of the mayor on its journals, and by resolution declared that said order No. 2,622 was not subject to the approval or veto of the mayor, or to the further consideration of the board, and that the jurisdiction and power to fix water rates were vested in the board of supervisors by said section 1 of article 14 of the constitution. Thereafter, Julius Jacobs, alleging himself to be a citizen and taxpayer, brought a proceeding in mandamus in the superior court to compel the said board of supervisors to “act upon the objections of said mayor,” and “to proceed to fix said water rates” for the ensuing year. After a hearing, the superior court entered judgment decreeing that said order No. 2,622 was not a valid order without the approval of the mayor and without the vote of nine members of the board over the veto, and commanding the supervisors, and each of them, “forthwith to act upon the objections of the mayor,” and “to forthwith proceed to fix the rates or compensation to be collected for the year commencing,” etc. From this judgment, the defendants appeal.

We are satisfied that the judgment of the court below is erroneous, and that the facts found do not make a proper case for the exercise of the extraordinary remedy of mandamus. The clause of the constitution—section 1, art. 14—under which it is sought to justify the judgment in the mandamus proceeding is as follows: “The use of all water now appropriated, or that may hereafter be appropriated, for sale, rental or distribution, is hereby declared to be a public use, and subject to the regulation and control of the state, in the manner to be prescribed by law; provided that the rates or compensation to be collected by any person, company or corporation in this state for the use of water supplied to any city and county, or city or town, or the inhabitants thereof, shall be fixed annually by the board of supervisors, or city and county, or city or town council, or other governing body of such city and county, or city or town, by ordinance or otherwise, in the manner that other ordinances or legislative acts or resolutions are passed by such body, and shall continue in force for one year and no longer. Such ordinances or resolutions shall be passed in the month of February of each year, and take effect on the first day of July thereafter. Any board or body failing to pass the necessary ordinances or resolutions fixing water rates, where necessary, within such time, shall be subject to peremptory process to compel action at the suit of any party interested, and shall be liable to such further processes and penalties as the legislature may prescribe. Any person, company or corporation collecting water rates in any city and county, or city or town in this state, otherwise than as so established, shall forfeit the franchises and waterworks of such person, company, or corporation, to the city and county, or city or town where the same are collected, for the public use.”

The city and county of San Francisco is a consolidated government, its charter being the consolidation act passed in 1856. Under that act the board of supervisors is the legislative department of the municipal government, although it is provided therein that ordinances upon certain enumerated subjects shall not be effective unless approved by the mayor, (whose office was created by said act,) or unless, after his veto, nine members of the board shall vote therefor. Under the act, however, there are many things which the board may do without the concurrence of the mayor, and there are many powers which the mayor may exercise independently of the board. Under this condition of the law, respondent contends that said section 1 of the constitution should be construed to mean that the mayor has the legal right to veto a water order; and that, under the facts above stated, a court can by mandamus compel the board of supervisors to refix water rates continuously, unless they either yield to the views of the mayor, or are able by a three-fourths vote to override the veto. Constitutional and statutory provisions are subject, substantially, to the same rules of construction; the main object being in all cases to ascertain the meaning of the law maker. A constitution “must be read, interpreted, and expounded in the same manner, by the same means and methods, which are appropriate to all other legislative acts.” Pom. Const. Law, p. 14. Now, it is clear that there should be no such a construction of language as would lead to absurd or impractical results, or compel a court to decree a thing substantially impossible, or which is in plain violation of fundamental principles of law or equity, firmly established and universally recognized, unless such language absolutely requires such construction. The judgment in the case at bar first commands appellants “to act upon the objections of the mayor,” which, we presume, means to vote formally on the question whether the veto shall be sustained, and then, assuming that there may not be nine votes in favor of the order, commands them forthwith to "proceed to fix the rates." If they should vote on the veto, and a majority of the supervisors, but not nine, should vote for the order, of course, under the judgment, they would be compelled to "proceed" and pass another order, and, if that should be vetoed with the same result, then another, and another, and so on indefinitely; so that, if the board should not yield its views to those of the mayor, there could be no legal fixing of water rates at all. But the section of the constitution in question provides that the water rates "shall be fixed annually," to commence on July 1st, and that "any board or body" failing to do so shall be subject to process to compel action, and that any person collecting water rates otherwise than as so fixed annually shall suffer certain penalties and forfeitures. If such a construction does not involve a palpable absurdity or an attempt to accomplish an absolute impossibility, it certainly does lead naturally and probably to what is substantially impracticable, and to a failure to consummate the purpose of the constitutional provision under review. Fixing water rates is an entirely different thing from passing, or refusing to pass, a proposed order or ordinance which merely involves ordinary considerations of public policy, and is not an absolute necessity. The constitution requires that the rates shall be fixed annually in February, and that, if they be not fixed, there shall be no sale of water to the inhabitants of the city after the ensuing 1st of July, by any person, company, or corporation. To do this in a large city like San Francisco, as appears from the order No. 2,622 and the lengthy objections of the mayor thereto contained in the transcript, is a laborious and complicated task, and one about which there is always likely to be great differences of opinion; and the notion that the framers of the constitution meant that this should be accomplished in a short space of time by two independent bodies agreeing upon every detail of the work, and that a court of justice should compel them to thus agree, or rather should compel one to adopt the views of the other, is not to be entertained for a moment, unless it be the necessary and absolute result of the language employed.

Moreover, the construction contended for by respondent violates the well-settled, long-recognized, and fundamental principles which have always limited and governed the jurisdiction of courts in the proceeding of mandamus; and a design to undermine and unsettle those principles is not to be implied by any construction not forced by imperative language. It is, beyond doubt, the universal rule that mandamus will not lie to control the judgment of an officer or tribunal to whom is given discretionary power,—the power to examine, consider, and determine. In such a case the writ can be used only to compel the exercise of discretion; but, when the discretion has been exercised, the writ cannot be used to compel a party to abandon his own judgment, and to make it conform to the judgment either of the court or of some other person. Every case where a party has been commanded by mandamus to do an act has been a case where the act was definite, certain, and fixed, and where its character and scope, and the result to flow from it, were as well known before the doing of the act as afterwards; as, for instance, when a municipal body has been commanded to provide for the payment of a judgment for a certain and definite amount. But no court in the course of the history of our jurisprudence has ever undertaken to control action by mandamus when the thing to be done was judicial in its nature, when the person or tribunal was "to hear and determine," and to come to a conclusion by the exercise of judgment and discretion, and when the result was not fixed and known beforehand. This principle was declared by this court as early as the fourth volume of Reports, as follows: "Whenever a discretionary power is vested in officers, and they have exercised that discretion, the courts will not interfere, because they cannot control, and ought not to coerce, that discretion, * * *" (McDougall v. Bell, 4 Cal. 177;) and it has been applied here in many subsequent cases. In High, Extr. Rem. § 24, the author, after stating the rule substantially as above, says: "It applies with especial force to cases where the aid of mandamus is sought against inferior courts or judges, public officers, municipal authorities, and corporate officers generally, and in all these cases it is the determining principal in guiding the courts to a correct decision. And whenever such officers or bodies are vested with discretionary power as to the performance of any duty required at their hands, or where, in reaching a given result of official action, they are necessarily obliged to use some degree of judgment and discretion, while mandamus will lie to set them in motion and to compel action upon the matters in controversy, it will in no manner interfere with the exercise of such discretion, nor control or dictate the judgment or decision which shall be reached." And that the supervisors act judicially when fixing water rates—that in performing that duty they should hear the parties interested, fairly weigh the evidence presented, and decide property rights according to their honest convictions and best judgment—is not only clear from the very nature of the thing to be done, but was expressly declared by the supreme court of the United States in Waterworks v. Schottler, 110 U. S. 354, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 48. In that case the court, speaking of the nature of the power conferred upon the supervisors of San Francisco to fix water rates, says: "Like every other tribunal established by the legislature for such a purpose, their duties are judicial in their nature, and they are bound in morals and in law to exercise an honest judgment as to all matters submitted to their official determination." And the same declaration was made by this court in Spring Valley Waterworks v. City of San Francisco, 82 Cal. 286, 22 Pac. Rep. 910, 1046; although it was held in that case that according to the averments of the complaint the supervisors had not exercised their judgment.

When we look at the language of said section 1 of article 14 we see not only that it fails to require the construction put upon it by respondent, but that it clearly avoids the consequences above stated. So far we have assumed that the constitutional provision in question is really susceptible of two different constructions,—one as presented by respondent, and the other as contended for by appellants; but it is readily perceived that the former is strained, difficult, and forced, while the latter is apparent and obvious, and rests naturally and easily upon the surface of the language employed. The first and leading words in that part of the section which designates the depository of the power are "the board of supervisors;" the balance of that part of the section merely makes exceptions of those municipalities of which boards of supervisors form no part. At the time the section was adopted there was no city and county, or city or town, other than the city and county of San Francisco, of which a board of supervisors was the legislative department; and it may well be presumed that the constitutional convention at that time had particularly in view the city and county of San Francisco when they expressly granted to the board of supervisors the power to establish water rates. But as there were some, and might in the future be other, cities and towns of whose government boards of supervisors did and might not constitute a part, and as other consolidated city and county governments could be established in the future, whose legislative department might or might not be boards of supervisors, it was necessary, also, to provide for the fixing of water rates in those kinds of municipalities; and so the section, after declaring that water rates "shall be fixed annually by the board of supervisors," (that is, of course, when such board was or should be a part of the government,) proceeded to provide, also, that in municipalities having no boards of supervisors the "other governing body" thereof should fix the rates. It is difficult to conceive how any other construction can be put upon the section without entirely eliminating therefrom the prominent and conspicuous words, "board of supervisors."

We do not deem it necessary to discuss the question whether, if we were to look to the consolidation act alone, the order No. 2,622 would require the approval of the mayor, although it is difficult to see that it would be embraced within any of the enumerated cases in which he is given the veto power by that act; and the veto power is not to be favored by any strained construction; it is to be recognized only where clearly granted. But the power in question here comes, not from the consolidation act, but from the constitution of the state. It could have been granted in that instrument to the mayor, or to the supervisors, or to any body of municipal officers, or to the judges of the courts. It was, however, expressly granted to the board of supervisors, and in the grant no mention is made of the mayor. Moreover, the "board or body" against whom a mandate will lie is the board or body to whom the power is given; and, if the mayor is part of that "board or body," he is subject to mandamus, which would be absurd. Of course, when a grant of power is made to several persons, or to a board consisting of several persons, the power is to be exercised by a majority of those persons, unless the power is otherwise limited by the grant itself. This is not only a necessary rule, and established by the general authorities, but it is expressly declared in section 12 of the Civil Code, which provides that "words giving a joint authority to three or more public officers, or other persons, are construed as giving such authority to a majority of them, unless it is otherwise expressed in the act giving the authority."

Our conclusion is that the power to fix water rates in the city and county of San Francisco is granted by the constitution of the state solely to the board of supervisors of said city and county; that the matter of fixing such rates requires the exercise of discretion and judgment; that the board, having exercised its discretion by passing said order No. 2,622, cannot be compelled by mandamus to change its judgment or to take further action thereon; that said order is valid, notwithstanding the attempted veto of the mayor, and legally fixes the rates to be charged for water of said city and county during the year commencing July 1, 1893; and that the judgment of the superior court, commanding said appellants to take further action in the premises, is erroneous. The judgment appealed from is reversed, with directions to the superior court to dismiss the proceedings.

I concur: GAROUTTE, J.

HARRISON, J., (concurring.) Whether the power to fix water rates in the city and county of San Francisco is vested in the board of supervisors alone, or whether the mayor is a constituent part of the governing body of that city and county, and thereby vested with the function of assisting in fixing those rates, is to be determined solely by the construction of the language in which the authority is conferred. The same section of the constitution declares that if any board or body fails to pass the necessary ordinances or resolutions fixing these rates, as therein directed, they shall be subject to peremptory process to compel their action. This is a mandatory provision, and, if the occasion shall ever be presented, the issuance of such process ought not to be withheld upon the theory that it cannot be enforced. We ought not to assume that any political body will refuse to comply with the law after it has been declared by the highest tribunal in the state, or that there will be any occasion for a court to invoke any force other than the moral strength which its own declarations of the law ought to impress upon every citizen. Article 14, § 1, of the constitution, declares that the rates for the use of water supplied to any city and county shall be fixed annually "by the board of supervisors, * * * or other governing body of such city and county, by ordinance or otherwise, in the manner that other ordinances or legislative acts or resolutions are passed by such body." If the determination of the question above stated is limited to the provisions of the constitution alone, it is clear that this duty is imposed upon the board of supervisors alone. The phrase "or other governing body," inserted in the section after the "board of supervisors" already designated, does not limit or qualify the functions of that board, but is evidently inserted for the purpose of supplying any omission in the previous enumeration of the titles by which the governing bodies of the several towns or cities may be known, and applies to those municipalities whose governing bodies are otherwise entitled, as, for example, the board of trustees in the city of Sacramento.

The respondent contends, in substance, that the term "governing body" is a nomen generalissimum, of which "board of supervisors" is only an enumerated species, and that for the purpose of determining what is the governing body of any municipality it is necessary to resort to the organic act under which the several cities are organized; that, by the provisions of the consolidation act of the city and county of San Francisco, the mayor is a constituent part of the governing body of that municipality, and consequently, in fixing the water rates for that municipality, he is to be consulted. We are not called upon here to determine how the water rates in San Francisco should be fixed in case the governing body of the city and county of San Francisco should be changed, as that city is still governed by the same charter as existed at the adoption of the constitution. The contention of the respondent that the mayor is a part of the governing body of San Francisco rests upon the provisions of section 68 of the consolidation act, which declares that certain ordinances shall be presented to him for approval "before they take effect." This "approval" of the mayor is, however, an act distinct from the passage of the ordinance, and is not called into exercise until after it has been passed by the board of supervisors. The mayor has no vote upon its passage, and the language of the section requiring it to be presented to him for his approval is that the ordinance, "after the same shall pass the board, shall, before it takes effect, be presented to the president of the board (mayor) for his approval." The act of 1868 (page 702) does not extend the power of the mayor in the passage of any ordinance or resolution by the board of supervisors, but merely provides that, in those cases in which he is authorized to exercise a disapproval of their acts, nine votes shall be necessary to override his action. The same act provides that any ordinance, order, or resolution may be passed by the vote of seven members of the board, and consequently every ordinance which is adopted by seven members is valid immediately upon its passage, unless by virtue of section 68 it requires his approval. See Chumasero v. Potts, 2 Mont. 285. The mayor is not a member of the board of supervisors, nor is he necessarily a constituent part of the legislative power of a municipality. His functions are of an executive or administrative character, and in article 11 of the constitution he is in several places styled the "chief executive officer" of a city. Whatever power he may at any time exercise in the legislative functions of a municipal government is never to be implied, but must find its authority in some positive statute; and as the constitution confers upon the board of supervisors the power to fix the water rates by an ordinance, and neither makes any limitation upon their absolute authority in the matter nor refers to any approval of their act by the mayor, we are not justified in holding that his approval is necessary.

It is further contended by the respondent that, inasmuch as the constitution requires the ordinance fixing the water rates to be passed by the board of supervisors "in the manner that other ordinances or legislative acts or resolutions are passed by such body," and as by the provisions of section 68 of the consolidation act the mayor's approval is necessary to the validity of certain ordinances, of which it is claimed this is one, such approval is a part of the "manner" in which the ordinance must be passed. The theory of this contention would require us to hold that this article of the constitution incorporates into its terms the various provisions of the several charters of cities in this state respecting the manner of passing ordinances, and, instead of having an organic act of the state whose provisions are specific and definite, we would have a constitution to be differently construed in different portions of the state. It would place us in the additional dilemma of having a constitution whose provisions may be varied by each legislature, or one with which there might be no means of compliance. If the manner in which the water rates are to be fixed is to be determined by the legislature, and that body should at any time provide that such an ordinance of a municipality could be passed by only a unanimous vote of the board of supervisors, or city council, or other governing body, the plain provisions of the constitution would be destroyed. If, on the other hand, the manner in which the ordinance is to be passed is such as existed at the date of the constitution, it would follow that a subsequent change in the charter respecting the mode of passing ordinances would render the mode of fixing water rates different from the mode of passing any other ordinance, and might be utterly impracticable. For example, if the city of San Francisco should adopt a charter in which two boards of supervisors were provided, it would be difficult to determine which of the two would have the power to pass the rates, or, if they were to be passed by both how it should be exercised. By construing this provision of the constitution simply according to its terms and irrespective of any statute these questions are avoided. The reference therein to the "manner" in which legislative acts are passed may vary according to the provisions of the statute under which the municipal body is organized. There may be no power to pass any legislative act until after it has been offered at a previous meeting of the board, or until after it has been published for a certain number of days, or the charter may require that the vote upon its passage shall be by having the ayes and noes entered upon its records, or by having the original ordinance signed by the members of the body voting therefor. As a creature of the legislature, the mode in which the municipal body is authorized to act becomes the only mode in which its acts can have validity, and this provision of the constitution only means that the ordinance or resolution by which the water rates shall be passed shall be in that manner which will constitute it a valid ordinance or resolution. This, however, does not include any steps other than those which are necessary for the passage of the ordinance, nor does it include any act of any other character than its passage. It is sometimes provided that an ordinance shall not have effect until it has been entered at length in a book kept for that purpose, or until it shall have been published in some newspaper for a certain length of time. These are steps necessary to give validity to the ordinance, for its enforcement, but are entirely disconnected with its passage. The ordinance provided in this section of the constitution becomes valid immediately upon its passage.

Even under the provisions of section 68 of the consolidation act, the approval of the mayor does not become essential to the validity of an ordinance fixing water rates. His approval is required to only certain classes of ordinances which are enumerated in that section. These are ordinances "providing for any specific improvement, the granting of any privilege, or involving the lease or other appropriation of public property, or the expenditure of public moneys, (except for sums less than five hundred dollars,) or laying tax or assessment, or imposing a new duty or penalty." It is sufficient to say without further discussion that an ordinance fixing water rates is not included in either of these classes. The direct object and purpose of the ordinance does not involve the expenditure of any public moneys, but is to perform a public duty, imposed by the sovereign people upon a designated tribunal, of determining the compensation which the water company shall receive in the exercise of its franchise. Although this ordinance is the act of a legislative body, and is to that extent a legislative act, as has been sometimes stated, yet the act itself is more of a judicial than a legislative character, and was so determined by the supreme court of the United States in Waterworks v. Schottler, 110 U. S. 347, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 48. In that case it was said, with reference to this provision: "By the constitution and the legislation under it, the municipal authorities have been created a special tribunal to determine what, as between the public and the company, shall be deemed a reasonable price during a certain limited period. Like every other tribunal established by the legislature for such a purpose, their duties are judicial in their nature, and they are bound in morals and in law to exercise an honest judgment as to all matters submitted for their official determination." See, also, Spring Valley Waterworks v. City of San Francisco, 82 Cal. 307, 22 Pac. Rep. 910, 1046. The constitution substituted the board of supervisors for the board of commissioners which was authorized by the act of 1858, and it is reasonable to hold that the functions of the two boards are the same.

The proposition that the power to fix the water rates rests with the supervisors alone is not now presented for the first time. In Spring Valley Waterworks v. City of San Francisco, 61 Cal. 18, Chief Justice Morrison said that this provision for fixing the water rates "is as broad and comprehensive as the English language could make it, and gives to the board of supervisors of the city plenary power over the subject-matter to which the article relates;" and in another case between the same parties, reported in the same volume, (61 Cal. 3,) Justice McKee, in giving the opinion of the court, said: "Water rates must be fixed by the board of supervisors, pursuant to the provisions of the act of 1881, and not by a board of commissioners appointed under the act of 1858." In another case between the same parties (82 Cal. 305, 22 Pac. Rep. 910, 1046) this court said: "It must be conceded in the outset that the use of water for sale is a public use, and that the price at which it shall be sold is a matter within the power of the board of supervisors to determine." The act of 1881, (page 54,) above referred to, is a legislative provision for carrying into effect this provision of the constitution, and the first section declares: "The board of supervisors, town council, board of aldermen, or other legislative body of any city and county, city or town, are hereby authorized and empowered, and it is made their official duty to annually fix the rates that shall be charged and collected by any person, company, association or corporation for water furnished to any such city and county, or city or town, or the inhabitants thereof. Such rates shall be fixed at a regular or special session of such board, or other legislative body, held during the month of February of each year, and shall take effect on the first day of July thereafter, and shall continue in full force and effect for the term of one year, and no longer." In this statute the board of supervisors alone is designated as the body whose official duty it is to fix the rates, and there is no reference to any approval of their act by the mayor, or any limitation upon the manner in which they shall act; and for the purpose of determining whether their act is valid we have only to look to their organization and invoke the general rules of construction for determining how an organized board may execute a power conferred upon it.

For the foregoing reasons, as well as those presented by Mr. Justice McFARLAND, the judgment should be reversed, and the court below directed to dismiss the proceedings.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

PATERSON, J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment, and in the construction placed upon section 1, art. 14, of the constitution, by Mr. Justice McFARLAND. I think, however, that the judgment is not objectionable on the ground that it seeks to interfere with the exercise of the discretion of the board, or any member thereof, or that, conceding the theory of the petitioner to be correct, the writ must run against the mayor as well as the board. The record shows that, after the mayor refused to approve the ordinance and return the same with his objections thereto, the board of supervisors refused to entertain the objection, and refused to take any action whatever with respect thereto. If the mayor had a right to act in the premises, it was the duty of the board of supervisors to consider his objections, and it is in no way an interference with their discretion to say that they must act in some manner upon them. When they have acted, of course that is the end of the matter; their discretion cannot be controlled by the court. If it be conceded that the mayor is a part of the power which must fix the water rates, he is not necessarily a party to a proceeding of this kind. He acts independently, and upon his own responsibility. This he has done. The board alone refuses to perform its duty, according to the theory of the petitioner, and I see no reason why a writ, in such a case, should not run against that branch of the law or order making power. As the mayor, however, is not a part of the power which fixes water rates, under the provision of the constitution, the questions as to whether the judgment is directed against the proper parties, or whether it interferes with the exercise of discretion, are unnecessary to the decision in this case.

BEATTY, C. J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment upon the ground that the true construction of the constitution is that ordinances fixing water rates are to be passed as legislative acts of the particular municipality are generally passed, and not as they are passed in exceptional cases provided by act of the legislature. To hold otherwise would be to admit the power of the legislature and boards of freeholders to adopt charters under which, with respect to all other subjects of legislation, a reasonable discretion and freedom of action would be left to the legislative body, while with respect to water ordinances the legislative body would be so hampered and restricted that the fixing of rates would be practically impossible, thus accomplishing the confiscation of the property of water companies. The board of supervisors of San Francisco is the legislative body as to all subjects of legislation, with a few special exceptions, and its acts do not generally require the approval of the mayor. Water ordinances must be held to fall under the general rule, and not within the exception.

SHANKLIN v. HALL. (No. 19,075.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—REAL-ESTATE AGENT—PAROL CONTRACT—MEMORANDA OF AGREEMENT

1. Though an order for a new trial is made on an erroneous ground, yet, if the order can be justified on grounds of error in law occurring during the progress of the trial, it should be affirmed.

2. Plaintiff cannot recover on an oral agreement to use his knowledge and influence to enable defendant to sell or exchange certain land; such agreement being within Civil Code, § 1624, subd. 6, providing that an agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for compensation or a commission shall be void, if not in writing.

3. Letters written by defendant to plaintiff long after the alleged performance of the contract cannot be relied on as containing sufficient memoranda to satisfy the statute, when they do not state the agreement alleged in the complaint, nor refer to any of its terms.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Action by W. I. Shanklin against J. H. Hall to recover for services rendered in the exchange of certain land. Judgment was entered for plaintiff, and, from an order granting a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Hervey Bleecker and Ray Billingsley, for appellant. Victor Montgomery, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to recover for services rendered in the exchange of certain real estate. Judgment went for plaintiff, a motion for new trial was made and granted, and this appeal is prosecuted from the order granting a new trial. The case was tried by the court, and the new trial was granted upon the ground that "the decision was against law." The court made the following findings of fact: "That on the 17th day of April, 1890, the plaintiff and defendant entered into an oral agreement whereby it was agreed between them that plaintiff should use his knowledge and influence on behalf of, and render his services to, defendant, to enable him to sell or exchange the lands mentioned in the amended complaint herein, for which plaintiff was to be paid by the defendant the sum of $450 as soon as the sale or exchange was effected through his (the plaintiff's) knowledge, influence, or services rendered to him, the defendant." The court further found that the plaintiff rendered his services as agreed, and that a transfer of the land was made by virtue of such services of plaintiff. The findings are directly in line with the allegations of the complaint, and the court concluded therefrom that plaintiff was entitled to recover. We think the conclusion of law arrived at by the court erroneous, and that an appeal from the judgment would have resulted in its reversal for that reason. But a motion for a new trial was granted upon the ground that the decision was against law. It may be conceded, from the authorities in this state, that "the decision is against law" when the conclusions of law are not supported by the findings, and that such an error of the court should be reviewed by a direct appeal from the judgment; yet, if the order granting the new trial can be justified upon the grounds of error in law occurring during the progress of the trial, it should be affirmed. Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 Pac. Rep. 481. If such were not the rule, the moving party would be deprived of his rights to a new trial merely because the grounds upon which the order was made were not sound. Such an injustice is not tolerated by the courts.

2. Upon the trial the defendant objected to oral evidence of the express contract alleged in the complaint, on the ground that the sixth division of section 1624 of the Civil Code requires such contract, or some note or memorandum thereof, to be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his agent, and, therefore, that oral testimony was incompetent. The court overruled the objection, and admitted testimony of an oral contract, to which defendant excepted. This matter was material, and as the decision of it, if erroneous, was prejudicial to the appellant, he is entitled to have the question considered, and the decision of it reviewed on this appeal, although the trial court expressly based the order granting the new trial on the distinctly different ground that "the decision was against law." Among the contracts declared invalid, if not in writing, etc., by section 1624 of the Civil Code is: "6. An agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for compensation or a commission." The contract set out in the complaint is embraced in the findings of the court which we have quoted, and it appears to possess all the elements essential to bring it within the purview of the statute. It is not necessary, in the sense of the statute, that he should have been authorized to execute a conveyance of defendant's real property. Bouv. Law Dict. "The duty assumed by a broker is to bring the minds of the buyer and seller to an agreement for a sale, and the price and terms on which it is to be made." Zeimer v. Antisell, 75 Cal. 509, 17 Pac. Rep. 642; Sibbald v. Iron Co., 83 N. Y. 382. And this is what plaintiff was employed to do, and precisely what he avers he did in performance of the agreement on his part. As additional authority for the application of the statute to this case, see McCarthy v. Loupe, 62 Cal. 299; Myres v. Surryhne, 67 Cal. 657, 8 Pac. Rep. 523. The case of Wilson v. Morton, 85 Cal. 598, 24 Pac. Rep. 784, is not in point. In that case the plaintiff was not employed to purchase or sell, or to assist in the purchase or sale of real estate. An objection to the evidence should have been sustained, and this ruling of the court in this regard was an error of law which may be reviewed upon this appeal.

Counsel for appellant contend that certain letters written by defendant to plaintiff long after the alleged performance of the contract by plaintiff contain memoranda sufficient to satisfy the statute. But those letters do not state the agreement alleged in the complaint, nor refer to any of the terms thereof. The complaint contains a count upon an implied contract to pay the reasonable value of the same services alleged in the special count, but this count seems to have been abandoned. Nothing is claimed under it here, and the judgment is evidently based upon the special count. Let the order granting the new trial be affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; McFARLAND, J.; DE HAVEN, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

MILLS et al. v. FLETCHER et al. (No. 18, 150.)

MINING CLAIMS—EJECTMENT.

1. In ejectment for a mining claim there was evidence that defendants entered on the locus in quo in 1890, and that plaintiffs had made the requisite annual expenditure on the claim during the preceding year. The cause charged that if the jury found such facts from the evidence, and that defendants unlawfully entered and remained in possession under a hostile claim of title until the action was commenced, then plaintiffs are entitled to recover, regardless of whether defendants made a new location of the claim in 1891 on the ground that plaintiff did not make the required expenditure in 1890. Held that such charge was correct, since plaintiffs were entitled to the whole of the year in which to make the annual expenditure.

2. In ejectment, the verdict of the jury is conclusive as to damages, and the court cannot allow a different sum on finding made by the court.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Ejectment by Mills and others against Fletcher and others. There was a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Modified.

P. F. Simonds and Kitts & Bowman, for appellants. J. M. Walling, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Action of ejectment to recover the possession of two adjoining quartz lode mining claims, situate on the public mineral land of the United States, known as the "Hathaway Claim" and the "Peck Claim," each being particularly described in the complaint by metes and bounds; and also to recover $3,000 damages for the severance and removal from said claims of gold-bearing rock. The complaint was not verified. By their answer the defendants deny generally each and every allegation in said complaint contained; "aver that the premises described in plaintiffs' complaint are public mineral lands of the United States, and that plaintiffs have not done any work, or performed any labor, or made any improvements thereon, since December 31, 1889;" and also aver that the cost of mining and milling the gold-bearing rock mentioned in the complaint largely exceeded the value of said rock and the gold and other minerals extracted therefrom. Then, "by way of cross complaint," the defendants aver that they own and possess certain premises known as the "Consolidated Quartz Mining Claim," containing 40-37 acres, and describe it by metes and bounds; then further aver that plaintiffs claim an interest therein adversely to defendants without right, and also that their said "Consolidated Quartz Mining Claim" includes within its boundaries a portion of the premises described in plaintiffs' complaint, but that the boundaries and extent of said portion so included cannot be determined by defendants from said complaint, or by any other means. The prayer of the so-called "cross complaint" is that defendants may be adjudged to be the owners of the premises described in their cross complaint, and that their title thereto may be quieted as against the plaintiffs.

The cross complaint not being verified, the plaintiffs answered it by a general denial, and by a repetition of all the affirmative averments of their complaint; and also disclaimed any interest in the premises described in said cross complaint, except such portions thereof as were within the exterior boundary lines of the claims described in their complaint. The cause was tried by a jury on special issues besides the general issue. The jury found for the plaintiffs on all the special issues, and also returned a general verdict for plaintiffs.

The special issue as to damages was submitted to the jury in the following language: "Question No. 16. How many dollars damages are plaintiffs entitled to recover, if entitled to recover damages at all?" The answer to this was: "One dollar." In addition to the special and general verdict of the jury the court made special findings, all in harmony with the verdict of the jury, unless the following is inconsistent therewith: The court found that defendants took from plaintiffs' claim 162½ tons of gold-bearing quartz rock. "After said rock had been severed from the realty, said defendants converted the same to their own use, and received as proceeds from the working thereof the sum of $1,922.71. That they expended in and about said rock, after the same had been taken from the ledge in plaintiffs' claim, as necessary expenses in reducing said rock and extracting the gold therefrom, the sum of $807.25. That, in extracting and reducing said rock, defendants expended the sum of $2,750." As conclusions of law the court found that plaintiffs were entitled to recover the ground in dispute, and also to recover from the defendants, Skewes and Fletcher, damages in the sum of $1,015.46, and rendered judgment accordingly. The defendants bring this appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll containing their bill of exceptions.

1. About one-third part of plaintiffs' claim is within section 35 of the government survey, and two-thirds thereof are in section 34. For the purpose of showing an outstanding title, the defendants offered in evidence a patent from the government to the Central Pacific Railroad Company for section 35, which was excluded by the court, and this action of the court is assigned as error by appellants. In the first place, it appears that defendants put in evidence "a map of the premises; which map, it was admitted, correctly delineated the Peck, Hathaway, Standard, and Consolidated locations, and the conflict between them." This map shows that no part of the land in dispute is within section 35. In the second place, it is averred in the answer of the defendants that "the premises described in plaintiffs' complaint are public mineral lands of the United States;" and the answer of plaintiffs to the so-called "cross complaint" is to the same effect. It follows, at least, that the offered patent was irrelevant to any material issue, and that defendants could not have been injured by its exclusion.

2. It is contended that the court erred in giving each of the following instructions to the jury: "If you find from the evidence that defendants or their grantors unlawfully entered upon the claims of plaintiffs in the year 1890, and took possession of plaintiffs' tunnel, posted a notice of location upon said claim, recorded said notice of location, and extracted rock and earth therefrom, against the consent of plaintiffs, and under a claim hostile to plaintiffs' title; that thereafter defendants and their grantors kept exclusive possession of said claims until the commencement of this action,—then plaintiffs are entitled to recover possession of the premises in controversy, regardless of whether defendants or their grantors made a new location of said premises in 1891. Defendants could not go wrongfully, if you find that they did so, upon plaintiffs' claim in 1890, take possession thereof, and, while thus wrongfully holding such possession, make a new location of said claims, under the claim that the plaintiffs had not made the annual expenditure for 1890. Plaintiffs were entitled to the whole of the year 1890 in which to make the annual expenditure for that year, provided plaintiffs had made the annual expenditure for 1889, or had resumed work upon said claims in 1890, and prior to the entry of the defendants or their grantors." "The jury is instructed that on each mining claim located after the 10th day of May, 1872, and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than one hundred dollars' worth of labor shall be performed, or improvements made, during each year, unless such labor is excused by reason of some act of the defendants excusing the performance of such work sufficient for that purpose." As applied to the evidence, I think these instructions substantially correct. It is admitted that plaintiffs did the required annual labor on their claims prior to January 1, 1890. If the facts hypothetically stated in these instructions are true, the defendants should not be heard to object that plaintiffs did not do the annual labor required by law during the year 1890, or any subsequent year while they remained in adverse possession, and occupied the only tunnel that was open to the lode, and through which plaintiffs intended to work. Conceding that plaintiffs might have been permitted by defendants to do work on the surface of their claims, there is no evidence that such work, or any work outside of the tunnel occupied by defendants, would have tended to improve or develop their claims, or could have been done to any advantage whatever; and, if not, such work would not have answered the purpose of the law requiring annual labor. But there is no evidence that defendants would have permitted even useless work on the surface.

3. It is contended for appellants that the verdict of the jury as to the amount of the damages is conclusive, and not merely advisory, except as against the power of the court to grant a new trial; and I think this point should be sustained. The facts stated in the so-called "cross complaint" constitute a mere answer, and not a cross complaint. So far as material, they are that defendants are the owners of, in the possession of, and entitled to the possession of the demanded premises. The averment that plaintiffs claim an interest in the premises adversely to defendants is unnecessary, since that fact is even more explicitly averred in plaintiffs' complaint, and is put in issue by the general denial in the answer; and the averment that plaintiffs' claim is without right is also included in the general denial of all the allegations of the complaint. It is immaterial what the defendants called their pleading. Its character is to be determined by the court. Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 307; Meeker v. Dalton, 75 Cal. 156, 16 Pac. Rep. 764. The action is an action at law, and the defense is only a legal defense. A verdict and judgment upon the issues raised and tendered by the answer would quiet the title of the prevailing party as effectually as would any form of judgment asked for in the prayer appended to the so-called "cross complaint." It has several times been decided that in actions of ejectment and actions to quiet title, in which the defendant relies upon title in himself, a cross complaint is unnecessary. Wilson v. Madison, 55 Cal. 5; Doyle v. Franklin, 40 Cal. 107; Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 261, 22 Pac. Rep. 195; Meeker v. Dalton, supra. Matter constituting a complete defense should not be pleaded as a cross complaint. Hills v. Sherwood, 48 Cal. 386; Jones v. Jones, 38 Cal. 585; Association v. Wagner, 61 Cal. 349. The defendants in this action, being in possession, needed no affirmative relief. A general verdict and judgment thereon in their favor would have been conclusive evidence of their title as against the plaintiffs, and of their right to the possession which they already had.

If the foregoing views, as to the legal nature of the action and defense, are correct, it follows that the court erred in giving judgment for damages in a sum exceeding one dollar. The court should not have disregarded the verdict of the jury, except by ordering a new trial upon the conditions and in the mode prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure. I think the judgment should be affirmed, except in respect to the damages, in which respect it should be modified by reducing the amount of damages to one dollar.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed, except in respect to the damages, in which respect it is modified by reducing the amount of the damages to one dollar; each of the parties to pay their own costs of appeal.

WILLIAMS v. BISAGNO et al. (No. 14,271.)

STREET ASSESSMENTS—VALIDITY—ACTION TO ENFORCE.

1. A resolution to pave and curb a street required the city engineer to furnish the council with estimates. The estimates, in addition to the items of paving and curbing, stated, under the head of "grading," that 66 cubic yards of excavation and 42 cubic yards of embankment would be required. The grading, if taken from the entire surface of the street, would involve the removal of 1 5-7 inches in depth. Held, that it would be assumed, from the small amount of the so-called "grading" required, that the street had been graded, and that the grading mentioned in the estimates was merely the removal of small inequalities in the surface, and therefore an assessment for the paving and curbing was not invalid on the ground that it required grading, which was not mentioned in the resolution.

2. A recital in the record on appeal by defendant, in an action to enforce a street assessment, that plaintiff produced two witnesses who testified that the notice of the improvement "was posted at the time and in the manner required by law, both as to the number of said notices, the place of posting, and the time during which the same remained posted," sufficiently shows that the law as to posting the notice was complied with.

3. A resolution to pave a street, which refers by number to certain ordinances for the manner in which the work is to be done, is sufficient, without reciting the provisions of the ordinance.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. R. Swinnerton, Judge.

Action by C. B. Williams, administrator of J. E. Magary, deceased,—substituted as plaintiff in place of his intestate,—against A. Bisagno and others, to enforce a street assessment. There was a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Craig & Meredith, for appellants. Jas. H. Budd, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought by Magary against the appellants to enforce a street assessment. He obtained judgment in the superior court, and defendants appeal from the judgment, and an order denying their motion for a new trial. After the appeal was taken, Magary died, and his administrator, C. B. Williams, was substituted in this court. Upon their motion for a new trial, appellants specified three particulars in which they claimed the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision, namely: (1) It appeared from the evidence that the plans and specifications were not in accordance with the resolution of intention, in that they included grading, which work was not included in said resolution of intention. (2) The contract embraced work not within said resolution of intention, namely, the grading of said street. (3) The notice of said work, as posted, did not comply with the law, in that the letters were not an inch long, and said notice was not posted in two or more places." The only error of law specified is that "the court should have decided in favor of defendants."

The resolution of intention was to order Washington street paved with basalt blocks of the dimensions required by ordinance No. 239 of the ordinances of the city of Stockton, for the entire width of the roadway from one designated point to another, and to order curbing of granite rock, of the dimensions required by another designated ordinance, along the outside of the sidewalks, on both sides of the same street, between the same terminal points. By a resolution of the council, the city engineer was required to furnish the council with plans and specifications, and careful estimates of the cost and expense, of said paving, and of the curbing. This resolution was complied with. The engineer reported, under the head "grading," the following: "There will be a total of 66 cubic yards of excavation and 42 cubic yards of embankment. The embankment must be made from the excavation, and the entire work must be rolled at least twice with the city roller before placing sand upon it." After fully describing the manner in which the paving and curbing should be done, the "estimate of cost" was given as follows:

13,465 square feet of paving at
$.25	$3,366 25
606 running feet of curbing at $1.00	606 00
	$3,972 25

These plans and specifications and estimates were approved by the council, and were incorporated in the contract for the work. No estimate was made for grading, nor was any bid made therefor, except as included in the bid for paving, and the assessment and warrant were for paving and curbing. It is clear from the record that the grading mentioned in the specifications was treated throughout as incidental to, and part of, the paving. The grading involved a removal, if taken from the entire surface, of one and five-sevenths inches in depth, or, as the specifications show, an excess of twenty-four yards over what was required to fill the slight inequalities of the street. Such work is obviously incidental to the paving, as much so as putting on the three inches of sand required as a basis for the basalt blocks, and was within the work specified in the resolution of intention. The ordinance providing for the manner in which the paving shall be done is not set out, either in the transcript or briefs, nor is there anything in the record to show that the street had not been graded. We think it may therefore be assumed, not only from the silence of the record, but from the small amount of the so-called "grading," that the street had been graded; that the work denominated "grading" in the specifications was merely the removal of inequalities resulting from the use of the street after it was graded, and that the ordinance prescribing the mode or manner of paving provided for the removal of such inequalities as part of the work of paving; that the character of this work did not come within the meaning of the word "graded," as used in the second section of the act, and was used by the engineer only in the sense of being a necessary part of the work of paving, for which a separate estimate was not only unnecessary, but improper. The resolution directed the engineer to make plans, specifications, and estimates "of the cost and expense of paving with basalt blocks," and, the estimate not having included "grading," both the engineer, in making his report, and the council, in approving it, must have understood the grading as part of the paving, and within the ordinance upon the subject of paving. Dyer v. Chase, 52 Cal. 440, and Donnelly v. Howard, 60 Cal. 291, cited by appellants, are not in point. In Dyer v. Chase the resolution of intention was to curb and macadamize a street. The contract and assessment included macadamizing the sidewalk. And in Donnelly v. Howard a reference to the record shows that the assessment included "curbing," which was not included or referred to in the resolution of intention. It may be, as appellants contend, that the grading increased the bid for paving, but, as the paving could not be done without the prior preparation of the street, such preparation is properly included.

The contention that the "notice of street work" did not comply with the statute, in that the letters should have been "an inch in length along the line," instead of vertically, requires little notice. The object of the statute is to have the headline of the posted notices, consisting of the words, "Notice of Street Work," so prominent as to attract attention, and so distinct as to be easily read at a reasonable distance. A copy of the headline of the notice, as posted, is inserted in the transcript. The letters are more than an inch in length, vertically, and of reasonable proportion, and are sufficiently distinct. The sole purpose of the statutory provision having been fully accomplished, as well as literally complied with, a discussion of the question is unnecessary.

As to the point that it is not shown that more than one notice of "street work" was posted, the transcript contains the following: "The plaintiff thereupon produced two witnesses, who testified, in substance and effect, that the said notice was posted at the time and in the manner required by law, both as to the number of said notices, the place of posting, and the time during which the same remained posted." This condensed statement of the evidence upon this point, made by appellants in their statement on motion for a new trial, is, we think, conclusive that the law was complied with in that regard. At the least, it does not appear from the record that the requisite number of notices was not posted.

Appellants make the further point in their brief that the resolution of intention was not sufficient, inasmuch as it referred to ordinances 239 and 334, instead of reciting the provisions of those ordinances, and cite in support of their contention Crosby v. Dowd, 61 Cal. 558, to the effect that a decree foreclosing a mortgage must be, in itself, sufficient, without referring to other records. That case was, however, overruled in De Sepulveda v. Baugh, 74 Cal. 468; 16 Pac. Rep. 223; In re Madera Irrigation Dist., 92 Cal. 329, 28 Pac. Rep. 272, 675. The question here, however, is different. In Crosby v. Dowd the question was whether a decree was not void which purported to enforce a lien upon property not described in the decree itself, and which could only be identified, if at all, by a reference to conveyances on record. Here the reference is to ordinances showing the manner in which the work is to be done, and of which appellants were not only bound to take notice, but were conclusively presumed to have knowledge. Finding no error in the record, we advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

CRIMINAL LAW—JURISDICTION OF SUPERIOR COURT.

Where a defendant is convicted in the superior court of petit larceny, on an information which charges him with grand larceny, he may be confined in the county jail under such conviction, though the superior court has no jurisdiction of petit larceny, since the charge of grand larceny gave the court jurisdiction, and Pen. Code, § 1159, authorizes a conviction of petit larceny when grand larceny is charged.

In bank.

Application by Charles Bell for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that he was illegally imprisoned under a conviction of petit larceny. Denied.

P. E. & Robt. A. King, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner was accused by information of the crime of grand larceny, and, after a trial in the superior court, convicted of petit larceny. His imprisonment in the county jail upon that conviction is alleged to be unlawful, because the superior court has no jurisdiction of petit larceny. But the charge of grand larceny gave the superior court jurisdiction, and the statute authorizes a conviction of petit larceny when grand larceny is charged. Pen. Code, § 1159. Writ denied.

PEOPLE v. DEFOOR. (No. 20,963.)

CRIMINAL LAW—FORMER JEOPARDY—CONVICTION OF LOWER OFFENSE—MERGER.

1. Pen. Code, § 1159, provides that defendant may be found guilty of any offense, the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged. Defendant was convicted of an assault under an information charging him with an assault with intent to kill. Held to bar a trial on an indictment for mayhem.

2. The doctrine of merger does not apply in such case, for a conviction of mayhem could not merge a prior conviction and judgment for the same assault; but, if the information for mayhem had been the only one filed, a conviction would have merged the lower included offense, of assault.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Calaveras county; C. V. Gottschalk, Judge.

Jackson Defoor was convicted of mayhem, and appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. Reversed.

Reddy & Solinsky, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

HAYNES, C. The defendant was found guilty by a jury, and sentenced by the court to seven years' imprisonment in the state prison, upon an information for mayhem committed upon one W. R. Jones on the 19th day of December, 1891. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and also pleaded that he had once been in jeopardy for the offense charged, and also a further plea that he had been convicted of the offense charged upon judgment of the superior court of the same county, of Calaveras. The appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The bill of exceptions shows that on the 19th day of December, 1891, the complaining witness, Jones, was seated in Raggio's store; that the defendant came in, and, after addressing some abusive language to Jones, struck him upon the head with a whisky glass; that Jones got up, whereupon the two men seized each other, and, in the struggle that followed, fell upon the floor, each striking the other as opportunity offered; and that, during the struggle, Jones was bitten upon the thumb by the defendant. The fight lasted about a minute and a half or two minutes, when the parties were separated by others who were present. The bite caused an abrasion upon the thumb, between the first and second joints, about the size of the head of a lead pencil. The complaining witness, the same day, went to a physician, and had the wound upon his head dressed, but did not call the attention of the physician to the injury to his thumb. The following day he returned to the physician, complaining of pains in his thumb, and received treatment therefor, with a view to prevent blood poisoning. The treatment seems not to have been successful, and a few days later it became necessary to amputate the thumb. Afterwards, on the 4th day of February, 1892, two informations were filed against the defendant,—the first charging him with an assault upon the prosecuting witness, Jones, with a glass tumbler, with intent to kill and murder said Jones; and the second, for mayhem. In June, 1892, the defendant was tried upon the first information, and convicted of an assault, and judgment was duly entered against him that he be imprisoned in the county jail of the county of Calaveras for the term of three months; and the defendant was then remanded to the custody of the sheriff under said judgment. This judgment was entered June 10, 1892, and the trial upon the charge of mayhem was immediately proceeded with. Upon the trial of the information for mayhem, the defendant offered in evidence the information for assault with intent to murder, together with all the proceedings thereunder, including the verdict of the jury in finding him guilty of assault, and the judgment of the court thereon, to which evidence the people, by the district attorney, interposed an objection which was sustained by the court, and the evidence excluded, and the jury were instructed by the court, upon each of these issues, to find for the people; to which rulings the defendant duly excepted.

No question is made as to the form or sufficiency of the pleas, nor as to the fact that there was but one conflict between the prosecuting witness and the defendant. The court erred in excluding the evidence offered by defendant in support of his pleas of former conviction and of once in jeopardy, and in instructing the jury to find those issues for the people. The constitution provides that "no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense." The question arising under this provision is, what facts shall be held to constitute "the same offense," in any given case? That there are cases where at the same time, and apparently by the same act, different and entirely distinct offenses may be committed, need not be disputed. But this is not one of them. It is assumed on the part of the people that evidence to support the information for mayhem would not prove an assault with intent to murder, and that that is the test by which the question at issue is to be determined. But in this counsel are mistaken. Section 1159, Pen. Code, is as follows: "The jury may find the defendant guilty of any offense, the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged, or of an attempt to commit the offense." It was therefore entirely proper to charge the assault with intent to murder in a single count, and the effect of so pleading, the conviction being for assault only, is an acquittal of the higher offense; and a conviction of the lower gave the conviction precisely the same effect, for the purposes of a plea of former conviction, as though the information had been for that offense only. The information for mayhem does not, in terms, charge an assault, and it is not necessary under section 1159, Pen. Code, that it should. Nevertheless, an assault by the defendant upon the prosecuting witness is an essential element of the charge of mayhem; and, under the common-law system of pleading, it was always alleged that the defendant, "intending to maim," etc., "with force and arms did make an assault upon," etc., and then alleged facts showing the accomplishment of the higher offense. See Whart. Prec. p. 192. It is clear, therefore, that under section 1159, Pen. Code, above cited, the defendant might have been convicted of an attempt to maim, or of an assault only; and, if of an assault, there would have been two convictions for precisely the same offense. Nor does it make any difference that the conviction was for the higher offense, of mayhem, since that offense could not be proved without proving the assault, for which he had already been convicted. The doctrine of merger, to which great importance is given in many of the cases, cannot aid the respondent. If the information for mayhem had been the only one filed, the conviction would have merged the lower included offense, of an assault, but the conviction of mayhem could not merge a prior conviction and judgment for the same assault.

The circumstances under which courts have been called upon to determine what facts constitute the same offense have been so different and numerous that the authorities upon this subject are seriously conflicting, so far as the general question is concerned. I think, however, the views I have endeavored to express are amply sustained by the great weight of authority. In Bishop's New Criminal Law, (section 1058, subd. 3,) the learned author says: "A man convicted of an assault cannot afterwards be prosecuted for the battery in which it terminated, because, said Totten, J., 'the one is a necessary part of the other; and, if he be now punished for the battery, he will thereby be twice punished for the assault.' State v. Chaffin, 2 Swan, 493. And by the general and better doctrine a conviction or acquittal of a common assault will bar proceedings for an assault with intent to do great bodily harm, and other assaults aggravated in like manner." The only established exception to the foregoing proposition is where death subsequently occurs as a result of the assault, where it has been held that there may be a prosecution for the homicide, notwithstanding the previous conviction for the assault and battery. The same learned author above cited, in section 1051 of his work on Criminal Law, further says: "If the two indictments set out like offenses, and relate to one transaction, yet if one contains more of criminal charge than the other, but upon it there could be conviction for what is embraced in the other, the offenses, though of different names, are, within our constitutional guaranty, the same." And in the following section the test is declared to be "whether, if what is set out in the second indictment had been proved under the first, there could have been a conviction. When there could, the second cannot be maintained. When there could not, it can be." The case of People v. Majors, 65 Cal. 138, 3 Pac. Rep. 597, cited by respondent, is not in point. There two men were murdered at the same time, and by the same act. The defendant, having been convicted of the murder of one, to an indictment for the murder of the other pleaded a former conviction of the same offense. This court properly held that the murder of different persons, though by the same act, constituted different offenses, and that a conviction for one could not be pleaded in bar of the other. In People v. Stephens, 79 Cal. 428, 21 Pac. Rep. 856, the prosecution was for libel. The court said: "The only question in this case is whether the second prosecution is for the same offense as the first. If so, it cannot be maintained. The first prosecution was for a libel contained in an article published by the defendant in a newspaper. The second prosecution is for a libel contained in the same article, and published in the same issue of the same newspaper as the first. The words alleged to be defamatory are not the same in both instances. If they were, the case would be a plain one, but the publication, in both cases, was one and the same act. 'The act which is the essential element in the wrong, slander, and libel is a wrongful publication of language.' Townsh. Sland. & L. 121." So, in the case at bar, the assault is the essential element in both the alleged offenses. See, also, cases cited by the court on page 430, 431. And on page 432, 79 Cal., and page 457, 21 Pac. Rep., in the same case, the court, quoting from State v. Smith, 43 Vt. 324, said: "There is considerable conflict in the authorities upon this subject, but we think the rule is now well settled that where one offense is a necessary element in, and constitutes an essential part of, another offense, and both are in fact but one transaction, a conviction or acquittal of one is a bar to the prosecution for the other." In Wilcox v. State, 6 Lea, 571, it was held a conviction of robbery is a bar to a subsequent indictment, founded on the same transaction, for assault with intent to murder. The court said: "The assault or violence in the robbery case, being an essential element or ingredient of, and constituting an important and material part of, that offense, as it does in the offense of assault with intent to commit murder, and having been once punished in the robbery case as a material part thereof, it cannot be again punished, as it would be if the judgment below were allowed to stand." In the same case, the court further said: "It was for the assault at the time of the robbery that the conviction was had in this case. Force and violence were proved in each case, and were alike essential in both to sustain a conviction. It was one continuous transaction, in which defendants perpetrated a robbery by violence, dangerously wounding the prosecutor. Being one transaction, the prosecutor may carve as large an offense out of it as he can, but, it is said, 'he must cut only once.'" In the case of U. S. v. Wilson, 7 Pet. 150, the defendant was indicted for robbing the mail of the United States, and putting the life of the driver in jeopardy, the punishment for which was death. He was found guilty as charged. The president of the United States granted a pardon to Wilson; the pardon being expressly restricted to the sentence of death passed upon the defendant, and expressly reserved from its operation the conviction then before the court, of the charge of committing the same robbery, omitting the allegation of putting the life of the driver in jeopardy. The case came before the supreme court upon a certificate of a division of opinion by the judges of the lower court. In the opinion of the court, delivered by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, (see page 159,) it was said: "Whether the pardon reached the less offense or not, the first indictment comprehended both the robbery and the putting life in jeopardy, and the conviction, and judgment pronounced upon it, extended to both. After the judgment, no subsequent prosecution could be maintained for the same offense, or for any part of it, provided the former conviction was pleaded." The same principle is announced by that court in Re Snow, 120 U. S. 274, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 556, and in Nielsen, Petitioner, 131 U. S. 176, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 672. In the case of State v. Cooper, 13 N. J. Law, 361, the prisoner had been indicted, tried, and convicted for arson. While still in custody under this proceeding, he was arraigned on an indictment for the murder of two persons who were in the house when it was burned. To this he pleaded the former conviction in bar, and the supreme court of New Jersey held it a good plea. See, also, State v. Smith, 43 Vt. 324; State v. Shepard, 7 Conn. 54; Moore v. State, 71 Ala. 307.

The vice of respondent's argument is in treating the first information as a charge of assault with intent to murder, without regard to the included offense of an assault, and arguing thereon that, because evidence showing that the defendant was guilty of the crime of mayhem would not convict him on the charge of an assault with intent to murder, therefore the offenses were not the same, within the meaning of the constitutional provision hereinbefore cited. In People v. Gilmore, 4 Cal. 380, the court say: "An indictment, by operation of law, for murder, is also an indictment for manslaughter, and every less offense that may be included under the charge of murder, just as much as though it were charged in distinct and separate counts." See, also, Peo- ple v. Apgar, 35 Cal. 391; People v. Lee Yune Chong, 94 Cal. 379, 29 Pac. Rep. 776; Pen. Code, § 1159. The case, therefore, stands precisely as though the first information had been for an assault. The defendant having been convicted for that offense, he could not be prosecuted for mayhem committed during the same assault without violating the constitutional provision which protects him against being twice convicted of the same offense,—a provision as important, and to be as sacredly regarded, as the right of a trial by jury, or any other constitutional provision intended for the protection of the life, liberty, or property of a citizen.

As the decision reached upon the principal question is conclusive of the case, it is not necessary to consider any of the other points urged by appellant. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed; and, it having been shown to the court that since the submission of the cause the defendant has died, it is ordered that this judgment be entered nunc pro tunc as of May 5, 1893.

TOOMY v. HALE. (No. 15,183.)
RES JUDICATA.

In an action to recover $1,775 commission for renting premises, the court found that, in a former action between the same parties for the same services, it had been decided that defendant was not indebted to plaintiff therefor. Plaintiff claimed that the former action was on an account stated, or on a new contract, by which he was to accept $1,000 for the services, in consideration of prompt payment. The particulars of the original contract were fully set out in that complaint, the character of the services, the amount to be paid, and the manner of payment; and it was evidently framed so that there could be a recovery either on the original contract, or the new agreement to accept $1,000. Held, that the finding in the former action that defendant was not liable was conclusive.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by one Toomy against one Hale to recover for alleged services in renting premises belonging to defendant. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry N. Clement, (W. M. Cannon, of counsel,) for appellant. A. H. Loughborough, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This action was brought to recover the sum of $1,775, the reasonable value of services alleged to have been rendered at defendant's instance and request. The court found that, in a former action brought by plaintiff against defendant, it was adjudged that plaintiff did not render to defendant, at the latter's instance or request, the services alleged in the complaint in that action, and that defendant was not indebted to plaintiff therefor; that the services mentioned in the complaint herein are the same services alleged in the complaint in the former action. The judgment in the former action was held to be a bar to plaintiff's cause of action set up herein, and judgment was entered for defendant. From this judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff has appealed.

Appellant contends that the complaint in the former action was upon an account stated, or upon a new contract, by the terms of which the defendant agreed to pay, and plaintiff agreed to accept, \$1,000, in payment of the services alleged to have been rendered. The allegations of that complaint were substantially as follows: Defendant employed plaintiff to find a party who would take a lease of certain premises for a term of years, and promised to pay him therefor, out of the first rents collected, $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the amount of rent to be paid during the term; that plaintiff found a party willing to take the premises, and on October 10, 1889, said party and defendant entered into a contract of lease for a term of 10 years at a rental of \$625 per month, payable monthly in advance, from April 10, 1890; that plaintiff's compensation under said agreement amounted to the sum of \$1,875; "that thereafter there was an accounting by and between said plaintiff and defendant for and about the compensation to be paid by said defendant to said plaintiff for said services, and, in consideration of immediate payment by said defendant to said plaintiff of the sum of one thousand dollars, it was then and there agreed by and between said plaintiff and said defendant, on or about the 15th day of October, in lieu of the agreement hereinbefore mentioned, the said defendant should pay, and said plaintiff receive, in full satisfaction for said services, the sum of one thousand dollars cash, and defendant then and there paid to plaintiff the sum of one hundred dollars on account; but, though often requested, said defendant has failed and refused to pay the remainder of said sum, to wit, the sum of nine hundred dollars, which is now due and owing from defendant to plaintiff." The care with which the particulars of the original contract,—the character of services to be performed, the exact amount to be paid therefor, and manner of payment,—and the result of plaintiff's efforts under it, are set forth in the complaint in the former action, indicates that the pleader had in view something more than merely a declaration on an account stated. The complaint was evidently framed for a double purpose, and as there was no demurrer for uncertainty, or on the ground that two causes of action were improperly united, there is no doubt the plaintiff could have used it as a basis of recovery on either the original contract alleged, and services performed thereunder, or on the new agreement that the plaintiff should accept \$1,000 in consideration of immediate payment. Having gone to trial upon the issues thus tendered by himself, and the court having determined all of them against him, he is now bound by the decision. He cannot litigate the same question twice. In the former action the court decided that the services alleged were performed at the request of, and as the agent of, the party to whom the premises were leased, and not at the request of defendant; and, although in that action an express promise to pay a certain amount was alleged, the finding is conclusive in this action on the same question that was involved, viz. were the services performed at the request or instance of defendant? The judgment and order are affirmed.

BETHELL v. ROGERS. (No. 15,384.)

APPEAL—PRACTICE—TIME OF FILING TRANSCRIPT—COURT RULES.

Rule 2 of the supreme court, which requires the transcript to be filed within 40 days after taking an appeal, is not superseded, nor is the time of filing extended for 5 days, by rule 11, which allows the appellee 5 days in which to examine the transcript presented by appellant and to certify to its correctness.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county.

Action by F. C. Bethell against C. W. Rogers. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals from an order denying a new trial. Appeal dismissed.

A. D. Spivalo, for appellant. W. S. Tinning, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Motion to dismiss the appeal. Judgment was rendered in this case in favor of the plaintiff, June 24, 1890, and an order was afterwards made denying defendant's motion for a new trial. From this order the defendant appealed on the 29th of April, 1892. May 25, 1893, the respondent gave notice to the appellant of this motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the appellant had failed to file the printed transcript of the record within the time prescribed by rule 2 of this court. At the time of giving the notice, the transcript on appeal had not been filed, and was not filed until June, 1893. It appears from the affidavits that in the latter part of June, 1892, Mr. Weller, at the request of the attorney for the appellant, went to the office of the attorney for the respondent in Martinez, and there met W. S. Wells, who informed him that the attorney for the respondent was absent from the county of Contra Costa; that said attorney for the respondent was in fact absent from said county, and did not return thereto until about the 6th of July; that Weller asked affiant to certify to said transcript for said respondent's attorney, but was informed that he had no authority to act in the matter; that Weller thereupon requested him to forward the transcript to the said attorney by mail, which Wells agreed to do, and which he did; that said attorney was at that time at Cazadero, but did not receive the transcript so forwarded to him; that, after his return to Martinez, respondent's attorney received a letter from the attorney for the appellant requesting him to return said transcript, and that he endeavored to trace the same through the mail, but failed to do so, and never did receive said original transcript, and had no other communication with appellant's attorney until after the present notice to dismiss the appeal was given.

Rule 11 of this court provides that if a party shall present to the attorney of the adverse party a transcript on appeal in a civil cause, and request his certificate that the same is correct, and said attorney, upon such request, shall for a period of 5 days neglect or refuse to join in such certificate, the costs of procuring a proper certificate from the clerk shall be taxed against him. This rule does not supersede the provision of rule 2 which requires the transcript to be filed within 40 days after taking the appeal, nor does it extend the time for filing the transcript until the expiration of the period given to the adverse party to examine the same. At the time the transcript was left with Wells to be forwarded to the respondent's attorney, nearly 60 days had elapsed after the appeal had been taken; and, if it could be assumed that his construction of rule 11 gave him 5 days' additional time, he has presented no excuse for his neglect to file the transcript at the expiration of that period, or at least as soon as he had every reason to believe that the attorney for the respondent did not intend to certify to its correctness. The appeal is dismissed.

MONTGOMERY v. SAYRE. (No. 18,132.)

RELEASE OF SURETY.

1. One who gives his note as collateral to a note made by a corporation and indorsed by another person is a surety, as regards both maker and indorser; and, when the owner of the principal note has taken judgment on it against the maker and indorser, by releasing the latter he releases the surety.

2. A creditor who has a judgment lien on land of the principal debtor which is fairly worth in the market enough to pay the whole debt, if he combine with the owner in selling it at private sale for less than it is worth, releases the surety on the debt.

3. To show that the land was sold for less than its value at a private sale negotiated by the owner and a lienholder, the proof is not confined to the cash price at a forced sale, but it may be shown that such tracts in that region had never been sold for all cash, but always for part cash and part on mortgage.

4. On an issue of the real value of land at the time it was sold, evidence as to the prices realized by the purchaser on sales of small parts of it a few months after his purchase is not necessarily incompetent, but its admission is regulated by the discretion of the court.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

For reports of former appeal, see 25 Pac. Rep. 552; 27 Pac. Rep. 648.

Arthur Rogers and W. F. Goad, for appellant. Geo. A. Nourse, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The main history of the case is stated in the opinion of this court upon a former appeal, (91 Cal. 206, 27 Pac. Rep. 648,) and it need not be repeated here.

The first question in the case is whether or not Sayre, deceased, made the $10,000 promissory note to appellant, sued on, as surety for W. S. Chapman. Respondent contends that this question was decided affirmatively by this court on the former appeal, and that such decision is the law of the case. This court did say in its opinion on that appeal that "Sayre was, in law, a surety;" but we will not inquire into the somewhat complicated question whether that statement was necessary to the determination of that appeal, and therefore the law of the case, because we think that the correctness of that statement otherwise appears. Indeed, it appears from the complaint itself, which includes the presentation of the claim to the executor. It is not pretended in the complaint that the Sayre note for $10,000 was not given as security, in some form, or that an action could be maintained upon it, as on any ordinary promissory note, without averring extrinsic facts other than those appearing upon its face. The complaint avers that on April 19, 1884, the Pioneer Mining Company, a corporation, made and delivered to appellant, Montgomery, its promissory note for $110,000, and "that said note was indorsed by Wm. S. Chapman." (The evidence shows that the indorsement was preceded by the words, "Demand, notice, and protest waived April 19, 1884.") It is then averred "that at the time of said delivery of said note, and to secure the payment of the same, there was delivered to plaintiff, by way of pledge, all the capital stock of said corporation, except thirty shares thereof, and said corporation did execute to plaintiff its mortgage on the Pioneer mine, in Sierra county in said state, and said A. L. Sayre, now deceased, who was then living, did make, execute, and deliver his promissory note, hereafter designated as the 'Sayre Note,' bearing even date herewith, for the sum of ten thousand dollars, ($10,000,) the same being the note here sued on. It is then further averred that several payments were made from time to time on said note for $110,000; that afterwards plaintiff foreclosed said mortgage on the Pioneer mine; that the proceeds of the sale of the mine under said foreclosure were applied to the payment of said note, but were not sufficient to satisfy it; that a deficiency judgment was entered and docketed against said corporation and against said Chapman for $61,554.13; that thereafter certain payments were made on said note and judgment; and that there remains due and unpaid on said note and judgment the sum of $34,551.20. It is further averred that said corporation has no other property, and that its capital stock is valueless, and upon these averments plaintiff bases his right to recover the amount of the Sayre note. From the foregoing averments, it seems quite clear to us that Sayre was a surety for Chapman,—for Chapman as well as for the mining company. It appears that on April 19, 1884, there was made and delivered to appellant a promissory note for $110,000 signed at the bottom by the Pioneer Company, and indorsed by Chapman, and that, "to secure the payment of the same," Sayre, deceased, made the "Sayre note," for $10,000. It was to secure the $110,000, just as it stood,—with the names of the responsible parties thereto, the maker and indorser written therein and thereon,—that Sayre made his note. The only liability which he assumed to appellant was that if the persons who signed said $110,000 note—the one, in form, as maker, and the other as indorser, with demand and notice waived—should fail to pay the same, he (Sayre) would be liable for the same to the extent of his $10,000 note. He based his contingent liability upon the probable financial ability of both the mining company and Chapman. As to him, they were both principals; and he was exonerated if, by any act of appellant, the latter's rights or remedies against either the mining company or Chapman were impaired, suspended, or destroyed. And this conclusion is made still more apparent by the fact that the $110,000 note was merged in a deficiency judgment against both the mining company and Chapman.

Sayre, then, being a surety, he was exonerated (1) if appellant, Montgomery, released Chapman from all liability under said judgment, and thus released the surety; or (2) if Montgomery, having a judgment lien upon land of Chapman, which, if sold at its real value, would have realized a sufficient amount of money to satisfy all indebtedness of the latter to the former, including said judgment, united with Chapman in selling and conveying said land at private sale to one Hughes for a price far less than its real value. The jury returned a general verdict for defendant, no special issues having been submitted to them; and it is quite clear that they were warranted by the evidence in finding the first of the said two propositions in favor of respondent,—that is, that Montgomery released Chapman. And there is no specification of the insufficiency of the evidence to support such a finding, or of any erroneous ruling of the court as to the admissibility of evidence on that point. Respondent contends that the general verdict imports a finding in his favor of all the material issues, and therefore a finding that appellant released Chapman; and that, this being so, it is immaterial whether or not the court committed any errors with respect to the second question as to the value of the land sold to Hughes. Appellant contends, however, that it cannot be known upon what ground the jury based their verdict, and therefore, if the court committed errors about the question of the value of the land, the judgment should be reversed. We will assume, for the purpose of this decision, that appellant's view of the matter is correct, because we do not think that the court committed any reversible error in its rulings concerning the value of the land.

With respect to the question of the value of the land, appellant took a number of exceptions to the rulings of the court in passing upon offered evidence, and instructing the jury on that subject. The various exceptions, however, present, mainly, one point, which may be stated as follows: Appellant contended that the only question proper to be asked witnesses on the subject of value was, what would the land have brought if respondent had taken out an execution, and had it sold by the sheriff at public auction for full cash value? while the court admitted evidence that, in the region of the land in question, large tracts of land had never been sold for all cash, but for from one-fourth to one-third cash, and the balance on reasonable time, and at a reasonable rate of interest, secured by mortgage on the land sold, and allowed witnesses to be asked the general question, "what was the fair market value" of the land at the time of the sale to Hughes? In thus ruling, the court, in our opinion, did not commit error. The respondent declined to pursue his lien against the land, and sold it at private sale; and, having done so, the question before the jury was the difference between the amount for which it was sold, and its fair market value at the time of sale; and, in arriving at the real value of the land, the jury were not confined in this case, any more than they would have been in any other case, to what it would have brought at a forced sale for cash. They had the right to consider the character and situation of the property, and the usual methods by which sales of such property were effected, where there were parties wanting to sell, and parties wanting to buy. Indeed, it would have been practically impossible to have determined the market value of such land upon the supposition of full cash payment, for there had been no such sales. It was proper, therefore, for the jury to have such information as the said ruling of the court allowed them. The testimony admitted tended to show the fair market value of the land, and furnished proper aid to the jury in determining such value. The case of Cassin v. Marshall, 18 Cal. 689, cited by appellant, dealt with facts very different from those in the case at bar. It is to be remarked, also, that the sale from appellant to Hughes was for a very small amount in cash, and the balance on time, secured by mortgage.

It is also contended that the court erred in allowing some testimony of the amounts for which Hughes sold some small parts of the land "a few months" after the sale to him. This, considering the other evidence in the case, would be a matter of too small importance to work a reversal of the judgment, even if be conceded that the ruling was erroneous. But we do not think that the ruling was erroneous. While the thing to be determined is the value on the day in question, still, evidence is not necessarily confined to that very day. Evidence of value for short periods before and after the day in question has been frequently allowed. Its allowance is greatly within the discretion of the court, and, under the circumstances of this case, we do not think that such discretion was abused. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

WAGNER v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (No. 15,506.)¹

INSOLVENCY—PROCEEDING TO VACATE DISCHARGE—WHO MAY COMMENCE.

Where a person has been discharged in insolvency, the court has no jurisdiction to hear a petition by his assignee to annul the certificate of discharge, since, under Insolvent Act 1880, § 53, providing that "any creditor" of an insolvent debtor who has obtained such discharge may contest its validity on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained, such a proceeding can only be commenced by a creditor.

In bank.

Petition by L. M. Wagner for a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court of Los Angeles county from proceeding under an order made by it directing petitioner to appear and show cause why an order made on a petition for insolvency discharging her from her debts should not be vacated. Writ granted.

W. H. Pollard, for petitioner. Mr. Graff, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Application for a writ of prohibition. It appears that on September 28, 1892, the petitioner, L. M. Wagner, was adjudged insolvent by the superior court of Los Angeles, and subsequently the court, in the matter of the insolvency proceeding, made a distribution of all of the estate of the insolvent which had come into the possession of the assignee, and granted to the petitioner here a certificate of discharge from all debts and claims existing against her at the date of the filing of her petition to be adjudged insolvent, and also made an order discharging the assignee. When these orders were made, the insolvency proceedings were ended, and the court had no further jurisdiction over the person of the insolvent, and this jurisdiction could only be restored by an application upon the part of some creditor of the insolvent to set aside and annul the decree or certificate discharging her from her indebtedness, as provided by section 53 of the insolvent act. Certainly, after the insolvency proceeding was thus ended, the court was without authority to proceed under either section 24 or section 47 of the insolvent act, and examine the petitioner here, or other persons, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not all the property of the insolvent estate had come into the hands of the assignee. It seems, however, that since the making of the orders referred to, two petitions have been filed in the superior court, each praying that the certificate of discharge granted to the petitioner herein be annulled upon the ground of alleged fraud in obtaining it. One of these petitions was filed by the assignee in the insolvency proceeding, and the other by a creditor of the insolvent Wagner. The court thereupon made an order requiring the petitioner herein to appear on October 30, 1893, and show cause why the order discharging her from her indebtedness should not be vacated, and upon the same day, upon application of the assignee, the court made an order requiring the petitioner here to appear before the court upon a day named for examination in relation to her property, and also directed that subpoenas should issue requiring the attendance as witnesses of other persons claiming to own such property. The object of this proceeding is to prohibit the court from proceeding under this latter order. We think the application must be granted. The court is without any jurisdiction to hear the petition of the assignee, asking that the certificate of discharge be annulled. Such a proceeding can only be commenced by a creditor of the insolvent. Section 53, Insolvent Act; Sanborn v. Doe, 92 Cal. 152, 28 Pac.

¹ Insolvent Act 1880, § 53, provides that "any creditor" of an insolvent debtor who has obtained a discharge from his debts may contest the validity of the discharge on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained.

Rep. 105. The order under which the court is proceeding seems to be based upon this petition, and is void. In the matter of the petition filed by the creditor, the petitioner and the other persons named in the order may be required to give their depositions under section 2021 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or to appear in open court and give their testimony upon the issues arising upon such petition and the answer thereto. Let the writ of prohibition issue.

PEOPLE v. BAKER. (No. 21,004.)

FORGERY—MORTGAGE OF HOMESTEAD—INFORMATION—ALLEGING VENUE—UTTERING FORGED INSTRUMENT—EVIDENCE—VARIANCE.

1. An information is not defective merely because the word "information" does not appear in the body of it.

2. The words "county of Los Angeles, state of California," having been used in the first part of an information, an allegation thereafter that the crime was committed "at the county and state aforesaid" is a sufficient averment of venue.

3. Signing the name of a married man to a mortgage of property on which there is a homestead declaration, if done with intent to defraud him and the man from whom it is proposed to raise money thereon, may be forgery, though the mortgage would not have been good without the execution of it by both the husband and wife.

4. Placing the mortgage on record because the one who was to loan money on the mortgage desired it on record before he examined the title, was a sufficient uttering of the forged instrument.

5. The fact that the mortgage in evidence had attached a certificate of acknowledgment, while the one set forth in the information did not have a certificate, did not constitute a fatal variance.

6. The mortgage, as set forth in the information, having contained a copy of a note which it was given to secure, there was no error in allowing proof of the signing of the note as well as the mortgage, both being parts of the same transaction, one preliminary to the other.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Edward L. Baker was convicted of forgery, and appeals. Affirmed.

Z. G. Peck and S. M. White, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The defendant was charged with and convicted of the crime of forgery, and appeals from the judgment, and also from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The appellant makes a great many points in his briefs, and elaborately argues them, and we will notice briefly what we consider the most important of such points.

1. Appellant contends that the information is fatally defective because the word "information" is not used in the body of that pleading. The word "information" appears as a heading of the pleading, and the body of the pleading commences as follows: "The said Edward L. Baker is accused by the district attorney," etc. But, as the pleading alleges all the facts necessary to constitute the crime sought to be charged, it is not defective merely because the word "information" is not used in the body of the instrument. The variation from the usual form was, we presume, the effect of oversight, or perhaps of an unexplainable desire to take a new departure; but this variation is not sufficiently material to make the pleading invalid. We think, also, that the averment of venue is sufficient. The words "county of Los Angeles, state of California," having been used in the first part of the information, it was sufficient afterwards to allege that the crime was committed "at the county and state aforesaid."

2. The alleged forgery was of a certain mortgage, purporting to have been signed by one Morris M. Green; and it is contended by appellant that, because said Green was a married man, and there was a homestead declaration on the property covered by the mortgage, therefore no forgery in law could be committed by signing the name of Green alone to the instrument. But if the instrument was falsely made in the name of Green, with intent, as is alleged in the information, to defraud the said Morris M. Green and one Strassforth, from whom the money was to be borrowed on the mortgage, the act was forgery, whether or not, as a matter of law, the mortgage would have been good without the execution of it by both husband and wife. The mortgage was placed on record in the recorder's office by the appellant, or by one Hoy, who was the principal in the alleged crime, because Strassforth, who was to loan the money on the mortgage, desired it to be placed on record before he examined the title; and we think that, under the circumstances, this was a sufficient uttering of the alleged forged instrument, although it was not in any other way delivered to Strassforth, who about that time began to suspect the fraud.

3. The mortgage introduced in evidence had attached to it a certificate of acknowledgment, while the copy of the mortgage set forth in the information did not have such certificate. We do not think that this was a fatal variance.

4. The mortgage as set forth in the information contained a copy of a promissory note which it was given to secure, and we do not think that the court erred in allowing proof of the signing of the note as well as the mortgage. They were both parts of the same transaction, and one was preliminary to the other.

5. We have examined the instructions given to the jury by the court, and those asked by defendant and refused, and we do not see any errors committed by the court in the matter of instructing the jury. Of the instructions asked by the defendant and refused, those which were correct were given in other parts of the charge.

6. There are a great many exceptions in the record to the rulings of the court upon the admissibility of evidence, but we see no material error committed by the court in such rulings.

7. The most serious point made by appellant is that during the progress of the trial the court unnecessarily and unjustly censured the attorney of appellant, and applied to his conduct of the case improper adverse criticism, and thus prejudiced the jury against the attorney, and therefore against appellant. This contention has certainly some plausible reasons for its support, but after a full consideration of the whole matter we do not think that what passed from the court to appellant's counsel was of sufficient impropriety or importance to warrant us in setting aside the verdict. The great difficulty with an appellate court in determining such a question is to learn from a dry, printed transcript the true character and quality of the thing complained of. It is not photographed before us, and we cannot know the tone, the emphasis, the expression, or the manner with which the thing was said or done. The language complained of related mainly to what the court considered an unnecessary consumption of time by appellant's counsel in examining and cross-examining witnesses, making objections, etc. The court, no doubt, might have confined counsel within proper limits of time in conducting the defense by the use of less harsh language; but that nice mingling of the fortiter in re and the suaviter in modo which would enable a presiding judge to always keep in hand the orderly conduct of a trial without an occasional jerk is not to be often expected. Counsel for appellant seems to have been entirely respectful in his manner to the court, but his repetition of questions, many of which were pointless, was a useless waste of time. Some of the witnesses for the people had been examined on a previous trial of another person for the same offense, and upon a preliminary examination before a magistrate, and counsel for appellant asked them a great many questions about what they had testified on those former occasions. This was proper, of course, if there had been an apparent intent to show a difference between their former and their present testimony; but most of the questions were whether or not they had said things on the former occasions which were exactly the same things to which they had just then presently testified. All this was no doubt trying to the patience of the court; and, while some of the language used by the court to counsel is not at all to be commended, we do not think that, considering the whole case, the appellant was prejudiced or injured thereby. There are no other points necessary to be considered. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HOVEY v. WALBANK et al. (No. 18,187.)

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—RIGHTS OF LEGATEES.

Under a will giving to testator's wife all his property to expend as she may see fit, with full power to dispose of any or all of it as she may deem proper, and with power to convey all interest which testator might have in his property at his death, a provision directing that, after the death of the wife, certain legacies be paid from any money remaining to testator's estate, gives the legatees named no rights in the property as against grantees of the testator's wife.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by Frank Hovey, as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Charles Breton, deceased, against Edward M. Walbank and another, to recover property which had belonged to testator's estate. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. F. Coburn, for appellant. Gills & Tapscott, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. Charles Breton died on the 4th of August, 1890, leaving a will of which the following are the material parts necessary to be here considered: "First. I direct that all my just debts, the expenses of my last sickness, and my funeral expenses be paid from the first money that shall come to the hands of my executrix herein-after named. Secondly. I will, bequeath, and devise to my beloved wife, Bertha Breton, all of the remainder of my property, real, personal, and mixed, and wherever the same may be situated, to have, use, and expend as she may see fit during her lifetime, with full power to sell, transfer, or dispose of the whole or any portion thereof, as she may deem proper, hereby granting, giving, and devising to her full power to convey a fee-simple title to any of the real estate which I may own at the time of my death, and to convey all the right, title, and interest which I may have at the time of my death, of, in, and to all the property which may be hereby willed, bequeathed, and devised to her. After the death of my said wife, I direct that from any money remaining to my estate the following named legacies be paid." Then follow several legacies to different persons; and by the will his said wife, Bertha Breton, was made executrix without bonds. The widow, the said Bertha Breton, qualified as executrix, and such proceedings in the administration of the estate were duly had that on October 31, 1891, a final decree of distribution of the estate of Charles Breton, deceased, was regularly entered in the superior court in which said administration was pending, distributing said estate in the words of said will; and on November 7, 1891, a further decree was entered discharging the said Bertha Breton from all further liability as executrix, and adjudging that the estate was "fully distributed and the trust settled and closed." The said Bertha Breton took possession of all the property under said decree of distribution; and afterwards, on February 21, 1892, she made, executed, acknowledged, and delivered to the defendants, Edward M. Walbank and William Bisbee, an instrument in writing, by which she conveyed and transferred to said defendants all the property mentioned in said decree of distribution, and in said will remaining undisposed of by her at that time; and the said defendants thereupon immediately took possession of all of said property. This instrument provided that the defendants should execute certain trusts therein expressly declared. Afterwards the said Bertha Breton died, and the plaintiff herein, who was public administrator, procured himself to be appointed administrator with the will annexed of the estate of said Charles Breton, deceased. As such administrator he commenced this action against said defendants, Walbank and Bisbee, to recover possession of all the property in their hands which had belonged to said Charles Breton, deceased, at the time of his death. The defendants answered, claiming ownership of said property under said conveyance from said Bertha Breton. At the trial—the evidence and admissions of the parties having shown substantially the above facts—the court granted a nonsuit, and entered judgment for the defendants. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Respondents contend, in the first place, that the judgment should be affirmed without reference to the construction of the will, because it appears that the estate of Charles Breton was fully and finally distributed, and the administration closed; that there was nothing further to be administered on in said estate, and that, if those who claim to be legatees under the will after the death of Bertha Breton have any rights in the premises, such rights could be asserted only in actions brought directly by said legatees against the defendants. We are disposed to think that respondents are right in this contention, but we do not deem it necessary to definitely determine this point, because, in our opinion, said legatees, under the facts, took no interest in any of said property. It is not necessary to determine accurately and to a nicety into what category of estates the interest which Bertha Breton took under the will should be placed. Under some authorities such an absolute power of disposition of property as this will contains is held to substantially and necessarily create an estate in fee, notwithstanding the fact that such a phrase as "lifetime" may also have been used. In Ramsdell v. Ramsdell, 21 Me. 288, the court say: "If estates be devised to a person with or without words of inheritance, and with an absolute right to sell and appropriate the proceeds at pleasure to his own use, it is not perceived how there can be a vested interest imparted to another in the same estate or property. Such full dominion in the devisee or legatee is inconsistent with and destructive of all other rights." But, however that may be, it is certainly true that where, in such a case, the devisee has actually disposed of all the property, there cannot afterwards be "a vested interest imparted to another" therein. In none of the cases cited by appellant was the language of the will the same as that used in the will here in question. In the present case the devisee was not confined by the words of the will to the mere use of the property during her life. She was not limited merely to such disposition or such change of form of the property as would enable her to better enjoy it. It was given to her to "expend as she may see fit," and "with full power to sell, transfer, or dispose of the whole, or any portion thereof, as she may deem proper;" and she was given "full power to convey a fee-simple title to any of the real estate," and "to convey all the right, title, and interest which I may have at the time of my death, of, in, and to all the property" mentioned in the will. It is admitted that by the said instrument in writing, executed and delivered to the defendants, she did in express terms convey, transfer, and dispose of all of said property to said defendants, and, having done so, there was not "any money remaining" to which the subsequent legacies named in the will could attach. The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

CRAWFORD v. MADDUX et al. (No. 18,140.)

INSOLVENCY — INSOLVENT ESTATE — MONEY RECEIVED BY CREDITOR — ACTION BY ASSIGNEE FOR EMBEZZLEMENT — CREDITOR AS TRUSTEE.

1. Money received by a creditor of an insolvent in consideration of not bidding at a judicial sale of insolvent's property cannot be recovered by the assignee in insolvency in an action for its embezzlement as part of the insolvent estate, under Insolvent Act 1880, § 23.

2. The fact that a creditor delayed the appointment of an assignee until the remedy by vacating the sale became inadequate could not give rise to such action, since it could not have been maintained if the assignee had been appointed without delay.

3. The creditor who received money from the purchaser at the sale for not bidding did not become a trustee of the money for insolvent's creditors, as the money did not belong to the insolvent or his estate.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; William O. Minor, Judge.

Action by E. R. Crawford, as assignee in insolvency of W. W. Granger, against L. J. Maddux, the Jacob Unna Company, Reddington & Co., Alfred Greenebaum & Co., Whittier, Fuller & Co., and Yates & Co. for the embezzlement of money of the insolvent debtor. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Chickering, Thomas & Gregory, Joseph Kirk, and L. J. Maddux, (Warren Olney, of counsel,) for appellants. Dennett & Needham, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. On September 26, 1889, one Goldzier obtained a judgment in a justice's court against Granger, the owner of a drug store. An execution was issued thereon, and on October 15, 1889, the goods were sold by the constable under the execution of J. W. Husband and G. S. Turner for $196, the amount of said judgment and costs. On October 1, 1889, the Jacob Unna Company, Reddington & Co., Alfred Greenebaum & Co., Whittier, Fuller & Co., and Yates & Co., (appellants here,) creditors of Granger, filed a petition in the superior court praying that Granger be adjudged an insolvent debtor. The record does not disclose at what time the order to show cause was made returnable, nor when it was served upon Granger, but on December 7, 1889, he was adjudged an insolvent debtor, and on August 15, 1890, Crawford, the plaintiff in this action, was elected assignee.

It was further alleged in the complaint, and the court found, that one A. C. Bonnell was the agent of the appellants, and as such agent agreed with Husband and Turner, who desired to purchase the store at said execution sale, that he would not bid at such sale in consideration that they, said Husband and Turner, would pay appellants the sum of $704; that Husband and Turner had represented to Bonnell that they were willing to pay $900 for the store; "that thereafter the said Husband and Turner did bid in the said store and stock thereof for the sum of $196, and the said Bonnell did refrain from bidding at said execution sale," and that thereafter Husband and Turner paid to defendant Maddux said sum of $704; that Maddux transferred the money to the Board of Trade of San Francisco, who paid the same to defendants, the said petitioning creditors, and that they "received the said sum of $704, belonging to the insolvent estate of said W. W. Granger, before the assignment therein, and, having notice of the commencement of the proceedings in insolvency, converted and appropriated the same to their own use, and refused to deliver the same when demanded by the assignee of the said insolvent estate, the plaintiff herein."

The court further found that the value of the store was $900; that the constable who made the sale had no knowledge of said agreement; that Husband and Turner had no knowledge that said $704 was not to be paid to the assignee of Granger, and that Maddux was an innocent agent in the transaction. Judgment was rendered against appellants for the sum of $1,408, with interest from October 15, 1889, amounting to $213.54, and costs of suit. This appeal is from said judgment and an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

The action is based upon section 23 of the insolvent act of 1880, which is as follows: "If any person, before the assignment is made, having notice of the commencement of proceedings in insolvency, embezzles or disposes of any of the moneys, goods, chattels or effects of the insolvent, he is chargeable therewith, and liable to an action by the assignee for double the value of the property so embezzled or disposed of, to be recovered for the benefit of the estate." By section 61 of the same act the filing of a petition by or against the debtor is declared to be the commencement of proceedings in insolvency under the act.

The judgment against appellants is based upon the theory that the property sold by the constable was of the value of $900; that Husband and Turner were willing to pay that amount for it; that the agreement between them and Bonnell, as the agent of appellants, prevented competition; that the money paid to appellants after the sale was the money of the insolvent's estate, and that its appropriation by them was an embezzlement of the money of Granger, against whom proceedings in insolvency had been commenced.

It is apparent that, if the money so paid by Husband and Turner was not the money of Granger, the judgment is wrong. Appellants have not at any time had possession or control of the goods under execution. The agreement in question was against public policy, and wholly void. If Husband and Turner had refused to pay the money, Bonnell could not have compelled payment; or if, after payment, the sale had been set aside because of the agreement, Husband and Turner could not have compelled Bonnell or his principals to repay it. Packard v. Bird, 40 Cal. 378; Freem. Ex'ns, § 297, and cases there cited. The payment was, therefore, voluntary, and the agreement was made by Husband and Turner for their real or supposed personal advantage. The finding of the court that they did not know that the money was not to go to the creditors of Granger does not in any way affect the question. The illegality and wrong of the agreement was the prevention of competition at the sale, and that illegality and wrong would have been equally great and equally capable of redress by setting aside the sale if the consideration had been but five dollars, or if the absence of competition had been procured by false representations or fraudulent devices, without the payment of any money. The amount paid cannot, therefore, because of the wrong, become the property of the execution debtor, nor create a demand in his favor for the amount so paid, nor even be the measure of damages, if an action of that character would lie.

The action here, however, is not for damages for any fraud practiced by appellants, but for the embezzlement of $704 of the money, property, and effects of the insolvent debtor; and the material question is whether that money was the money of the insolvent's estate. It will hardly be contended that, if the agreement had been to give appellants a pair of horses, or to convey to them a certain parcel of land, and the horses had been delivered or the land conveyed in fulfillment of the agreement, the plaintiff could have replevied the horses as the property of the estate, or compelled a conveyance of the title to the land, for the plain reason that neither Granger, before the adjudication of insolvency, nor his estate afterwards, was the owner of the property sought to be replevied or recovered; and, if not, an appropriation of the horses or the land to the use of appellants could not be an embezzlement. Counsel for respondent do not cite us to any case where it has been held that money or property received by one in consideration of not bidding at a judicial sale may be recovered in an action by the judgment debtor or his assignee, nor has any such decision fallen under our notice; and, if an action could not be maintained for the recovery of the sum so received, it must be clear that an action for its embezzlement will not lie.

Respondent's argument that the failure of appellants, the petitioning creditors, to pay the costs in the insolvency proceeding, whereby the appointment of the assignee was greatly delayed, and that the remedy by vacating the sale was thereby rendered inadequate, is, therefore, without force, because it could not operate to give a cause of action for embezzlement where that action could not have been maintained if the assignee had been appointed without delay.

Respondent also contends that appellants, who were petitioning creditors, were trustees for the creditors, and that the judgment should be sustained upon that ground. The execution was levied upon the store before the petition was filed, and the sale under that execution could not have been prevented. They were in no way instrumental in procuring the sale. Their only connection with it was through the agreement made by Bonnell, and, as the money paid by the execution purchasers under that agreement was not the money of Granger or his creditors, no trust was created in appellants in relation thereto.

These considerations necessarily dispose of other questions presented by appellants. I think the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

TEMPLE, C. Action to quiet title to land in Newcastle, in the county of Placer. The controversy is in regard to the boundaries. The plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and an order refusing a new trial.

The parties own and occupy contiguous places on Depot street, and both derive title from H. F. Albee. It is agreed that A. N. Page formerly owned a larger tract of land, of which the premises now claimed by both parties constituted a portion. September 9, 1875, Page conveyed to Mrs. H. F. Albee a tract fronting on Depot street 100 feet, and extending 150 feet back. The lots of the parties and the strip in dispute extend 200 feet back from Depot street. The tract conveyed to Mrs. Albee extends along Depot street 100 feet northerly from the Good Templars' lot. The strip in dispute is 6 feet wide, and the southerly line of it is just 50 feet 9 inches north from the Good Templars' lot. The deed to Mrs. Albee was a bargain and sale deed, and Mrs. Albee testified that she paid $50 for the land. There was no evidence tending to show that the money paid was her separate property. The land then was the community property of Albee and wife. November 19, 1877, Page conveyed to H. F. Albee a tract on the north of the lot conveyed to Mrs. Albee, fronting 20 feet on Depot street. This vested in Albee, or in Albee and wife, as community property, a frontage of 120 feet on Depot street.

Another conveyance was made by Page to Albee and Hogins of a tract including the land theretofore conveyed to the Albees and other lands. This conveyance was intended, as Albee testified, to take in odds and ends. The land described in this deed was conveyed to Albee by Hogins. November 17, 1880, Albee conveyed to Hogins a tract of land described as follows: "Commencing at the northwest corner of the Good Templars' Hall Association lot on Depot street, and running along said Depot street, about northwest, about fifty feet; thence nearly westerly about one hundred and fifty feet, more or less, to Page's line; thence fifty feet in a southerly direction; and thence one hundred and fifty feet, more or less, to the place of beginning." February 23, 1883, Albee conveyed to defendant Boggs a tract of land described as follows: "Commencing on Depot street in said town of Newcastle, at the northeast corner of A. N. Page's lot; thence westerly, along the south line of said Page's lot, a distance of 90 feet; thence south, 20 feet; thence west, 60 feet, more or less; thence south, 50 feet; thence east, a distance of 150 feet, more or less, to said Depot street; thence north along said Depot street, 70 feet, to the place of beginning,—together with the dwelling house thereon, heretofore known as the residence of the party of the first part." In none of the deeds from Page, under which Albee claimed, were any landmarks called for except Abbot's lot, Madden's lot, and Depot street. North of Madden's lot, no landmark was called for except Depot street. The distances are therefore controlling. There was nothing to do, then, but to find the starting point, and measure northerly along the line of Depot street. There was no chance, under such circumstances, for surplus land. It does not appear that any landmarks were set after the deeds were made which were agreed upon by the parties. The land was not immediately inclosed. In 1878 a fence was built in front of the property, and according to that, as I understand the testimony, there was a surplus of 7¼ inches only. Still, a witness, Elmer Albee, was allowed to testify, against the objection of defendant, that he assisted Mr. Page in measuring the 100 feet conveyed to Mrs. Albee, and that, "as nigh" as he could guess, it was 5 or 6 feet over. The only purpose of this testimony was to show that more than 100 feet passed by the deed to Mrs. Albee. It was clearly incompetent for that purpose. If they measured 6 feet over the 100 feet, that did not pass title to anything more than was described in the deed. Mrs. Hogins claims as heir to Daniel Hogins, and under a deed from Albee dated June 23, 1890. Apparently, at that time, Albee had no land to convey, and it is likely the conclusion of the court was based upon the testimony of Elmer Albee as to the surplus six feet. Oral evidence would have been competent to apply the description to the land. For this purpose it might have been shown where H. H. Smith's lot was, that it was the same property afterwards known as the "Madden" or "Good Templars'" lot, and where Depot street was. These facts appearing, there were no others which could have thrown light upon the matter. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

RAKER v. BUCHER, Sheriff. (No. 18,015.)¹

SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES—DUTIES—FALSE RETURN—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—PLEADING—ANSWER—CORRECTION OF CLERICAL ERROR.

1. Plaintiff's motion for judgment because the answer is evasive is properly denied, where plaintiff's objection to the answer may be overcome by the correction of an evident clerical error which the context shows to be the use of "when" for "where."

2. In an action against a sheriff for the penalty for selling property without notice, where the truth of the sheriff's return was in issue, undisputed evidence that the sheriff had admitted its falsity was sufficient to overcome the prima facie effect which the law attached to such return.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; G. G. Clough, Judge.

Action by Raker against Bucher, as sheriff, for statutory penalty for failure to give the required notice of an execution sale, and for damages. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Spencer & Raker and Clarence A. Raker, for appellant. D. W. Jenks, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant, as sheriff, sold certain real property owned by plaintiff under an execution issued upon a judgment recovered against him. The complaint in this action, which is verified, alleges that this sale was made by defendant without giving the notice required by section 692 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the plaintiff demands a judgment against the defendant for the statutory penalty of $500 given by section 693 of the Code of Civil Procedure against an officer for selling property without legal notice, and also for the actual damages alleged to have been sustained by him by reason of such wrongful sale. The defendant answered, and the action was tried without a jury, the court finding, in substance, that the defendant gave the notice required by law before making the sale complained of, and judgment was thereupon entered in favor of defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

1. The court did not err in denying the motion of plaintiff for judgment upon the pleadings. The answer was not evasive, as claimed by plaintiff, it being very evident that the word "when," used in one of the denials relating to the posting of the notices, is a clerical error, the context showing that "where" was the word intended; and with this correction the extremely technical objection to the sufficiency of the answer loses all of its force.

2. The point most strongly urged by the plaintiff for a reversal of the judgment is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the finding of the court to the effect that notices of sale were duly posted in the township where the property is situated, and in the township where it was sold, for the length of time required by law. The only evidence offered by plaintiff, for the purpose of showing that such notices were not posted, consisted of the testimony of himself and another witness as to verbal admissions made to them by defendant, to the effect that he knew that the notices were not posted, and also the testimony of one Merryfield, to whom defendant sent notices of the sale for posting in the township where the property sold is situated. This witness testified that he thought he received the notices for posting on January 27, 1890, only 13 days before the sale; but he was not questioned in relation to the grounds of his belief, and he testified to no circumstance enabling him to retain any fixed or definite recollection of the exact date when he received the notices, nor did he profess to be certain as to such date. This testimony was given about 17 months after the event, and relating, as it did, to a matter and date which the witness was not shown to have any particular reason to recollect with entire accuracy, was entitled to but little weight in passing upon the question when the notices were posted. The court below evidently did not regard it as satisfactory, and we need not further consider it. The only evidence offered by defendant was the writ of execution and his official return thereon, which upon its face showed a sale of plaintiff's property after notice given in the manner and for the length of time required by section 692 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The precise question thus presented is as to the effect of this return as evidence, and whether the court was justified in finding the facts to be as stated in this return, in the face of the evidence of plaintiff in relation to the contrary admissions made by defendant.

In an action against a sheriff for a false return, the return is prima facie evidence in favor of the sheriff. 2 Freem. Ex'ns, § 366. In the section just cited, Mr. Freeman says: "The better rule is that an action for a false return is not the exclusive remedy when an officer has been guilty of a breach of duty. He may be proceeded against in any other form of action in which such breach of duty is alleged as a ground for damages or for relief; and, while his return may be received as evidence in his favor, the plaintiff is at liberty to controvert it, if he can." See, also, to the same effect, Whithead v. Keyes, 3 Allen, 495; Barrett v. Copeland, 18 Vt. 67. This is an action against the defendant for a breach of official duty, and his official return, showing the manner in which he performed his duty in the matter complained of, is only prima facie evidence in his favor; and, as the truth of the return is the real question in issue in an action like this, only slight evidence aliunde is required to overcome the prima facie effect which the law attaches to the return of the officer; and when, as in this case, it is not disputed that the defendant sheriff has himself admitted the falsity of the return, a finding that its recitals are true, based upon no other evidence than the return itself, cannot be sustained. The defendant was called upon, in order to rebut the testimony of plaintiff concerning these admissions, to offer some evidence, either in explanation or denial of the admissions, or some independent proof that the notices were posted in the manner stated in the return. Judgment and order reversed.

AUSTIN v. DICK. (No. 18,184.)

ELECTIONS AND VOTERS—CONTEST—WHEN AUTHORIZED.

Code Civil Proc. § 1111, providing that any elector of a county, or political subdivision thereof, may contest the right of any person "declared elected" to an office to be exercised therein, for causes enumerated, only authorizes an examination of the right of a person "declared elected" at an election, the canvass of which is questioned, and does not authorize a canvass of votes where the election has been declared to have resulted in the election of no one, in which case a new election must be held.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; C. L. Chaffin, Judge.

Action by J. T. Austin against Morris Dick to contest defendant's right to an office for which contestant and contestee were candidates. A judgment refusing to declare contestant elected was rendered, and, to obtain a modification of the judgment, he appeals. Modification denied.

D. W. Jenks and G. F. Harris, for appellant. Goodwin & Stewart, Goodwin & Goodwin, J. W. Harrington, and H. L. Spargur, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an appeal taken to obtain a modification of a judgment in an election contest. It appears from the complaint that at the general election, November-

8, 1892, plaintiff and defendant were candidates, and the only persons voted for, for the office of supervisor of the third supervisorial district in the county of Modoc, and that at such election plaintiff received 87 and defendant 85 votes; that the votes were canvassed November 14, 1892, but the board refused to declare plaintiff elected, and afterwards, on the 8th of December of the same year, declared the defendant elected. The complaint then proceeds to set out certain alleged irregularities at the election, and, among them, that the board of judges at a certain precinct failed to count for plaintiff one vote which had been cast for him, and that the alleged misconduct and irregularity "procured said Morris Dick to be declared elected to said office of supervisor, when he had not received the highest number of legal votes therefor." The answer denies that said defendant, Morris Dick, was, or has ever been, declared elected at said election, but avers that the board of canvassers declared the result of the canvass of said election as follows: "It further appearing from the canvass of said returns that no person has received the highest number of votes for the office of supervisor of the third supervisor district, but that it does appear that, of the persons receiving the highest number of votes, J. T. Austin and Morris Dick each received the same number, and that no person has received a higher number of votes cast for that office, it is ordered that a special election be held in said supervisor district number 3 on the first day of December, 1892, for the purpose of electing one supervisor for said district, and that an election proclamation be issued and published, calling such special election." The court found this allegation in the answer to be true, and yet proceeded to find that at such election one vote was wrongly counted for Dick, which, if deducted from the votes counted for him, "will reduce the number of his legal votes below the number of legal votes given to said contestant, J. T. Austin."

The court, however, refused, by its judgment, to declare contestant elected, and this appeal is taken to obtain a modification and correction of the judgment in that respect. But the finding that no one was declared elected is upon a matter of jurisdiction. The proceeding is entirely statutory, and is to obtain a recanvass of the votes cast at an election in which some person was declared elected, and the contest is simply over the right of the person "declared elected." Section 1111, Code Civil Proc.¹ It is not, and cannot be made, a proceeding to determine the right of claimants to an office where one claims a right not depending upon that election, and the statute has not authorized the recanvass of the votes in the case, where the election has been declared to have resulted in the election of no one. In such case a new election must be called, although it may be that a candidate may question the correctness of the canvass in a different proceeding. Dick was elected at the special election called after it was determined that there had been no election at the general election. No fault is found with that election in the complaint. It is, in fact, wholly ignored. Perhaps it may be now claimed that the special election was illegal because there was then no vacancy. But this is a question which cannot be tried in this proceeding. There is hardly a section in the title in regard to this contest which does not show that the inquiry is limited to an examination of the right of the person declared elected at the election, the canvass of which is questioned. The finding, therefore, that no one had been declared elected, was a finding to the effect that the court had no jurisdiction of the matter. This present appeal does not affect the rights of said Morris Dick, who, it seems, has also taken an appeal. The relief demanded should be denied.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the relief demanded is denied, and the judgment affirmed.

SAN DIEGO WATER CO. v. SAN DIEGO FLUME CO. (No. 19,196.)

WATER COMPANIES—CONTRACTS—RIGHTS OF PARTIES—ACCOUNTING.

1. Plaintiff and defendant, two water companies,—the latter owning a water supply conducted to the limits of a city; the former owning a system of pipes for conducting it through the city,—made a contract by which defendant's water was to be distributed through plaintiff's pipes; the proceeds, after deducting operating expenses, including necessary extensions of the pipes, to be divided between them; the question of what were necessary operating expenses to be determined by the presidents of the companies, who were to be trustees of the properties. Held that, under this contract, plaintiff had no right to lease its property, and sell to the lessee a certain amount of defendant's water for a gross sum, with provision that, if extensions of plaintiff's pipes were necessary, the lessee could require plaintiff to put them in,—plaintiff to be allowed for the amount so expended 6 per cent. interest, and 3 per cent. per annum on the cost for deterioration of the extension,—and, plaintiff insisting on its rights under this lease, defendant could refuse to furnish water.

2. Plaintiff, having brought an action to enjoin defendant from shutting off the water, and for a determination of its rights as to a division of the money received under the lease,—proceeding on the theory of the validity of the lease,—is not entitled to have the action retained for an accounting based on the lease.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by the San Diego Water Company against the San Diego Flume Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Works & Works, for appellant. Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich and Shaw & Holland, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought by plaintiff to enjoin the defendant from shutting off, or preventing the flow of water into, certain mains and pipes of plaintiff. The court granted a nonsuit, and entered judgment for defendant, from which judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

Each of the parties is a corporation organized under the general laws of the state, for the purpose of distributing, selling, and furnishing water to consumers in the county and city of San Diego. The contracts and the relations of the parties out of which this litigation came are somewhat complicated. The main facts are as follows:

In September, 1890, the respondent, the flume company, was the owner of a supply of water which it brought from a long distance, by means of ditches, flumes, and pipes, to the boundary of the city of San Diego,—or, as counsel put it, “to the gates of the city;” but it had no pipes or other means, within said city, by which it could distribute water to the inhabitants thereof. The appellant, the water company, owned a system or plant of pipes by which it could distribute water through the greater part of the city, which it had been using to partially supply the city with water pumped from sources in the immediate vicinity. The respondent was negotiating with the city to sell or lease water to the latter, and an election had been called for the 14th of October, at which the electors of the city were to vote on the proposition of issuing bonds for that purpose. The respondent was endeavoring to carry the election in favor of the bonds, and the appellant was opposing that proposition. In the latter part of September, the appellant and respondent agreed upon the proposition to unite their interests, and a memorandum of such agreement was made in writing, but was not fully executed. After that the respondent ceased advocating the proposition of issuing the bonds. On November 6, 1890, the appellant and respondent executed a written agreement, which consisted of two parts, called in the pleadings “Exhibit A” and “Exhibit B,” these two instruments being intended as one agreement. By Exhibit A the respondent appointed the appellant “its sole agent for the exclusive sale of water within the corporate limits of the city of San Diego, California;” the appointment to continue during the continuance of the other part of the contract called “Exhibit B.” It was provided, however, that all sales made by the appellant should be subject to the approval of the respondent, and that no sales should be made without the consent of the latter. Exhibit B is quite a long contract, and its principal features are these: The parties appoint one Babcock and one Sefton, the former being president of the appellant, and the latter of respondent, as trustees, to whom they, in terms, “assign and give the absolute control of their respective properties, as far as the same may be confined to the corporate limits of the city of San Diego.” Said trustees were to hold in trust, and “operate and control, said respective properties, for the benefit and use of the respective parties of the first and second part, in the manner as herein mentioned.” It was stated that the parties were “to combine their joint endeavors for the advancement of their respective interests under this trust, subject to the conditions as hereinafter mentioned.” It was further provided that appellant should furnish “its entire plant, and any extension of the same, for the free use and occupation as the said trustees may determine for the uses and purposes of this contract.” The respondent agreed “to deliver, at a point in their flume or pipe line where the same does now or may hereafter intersect the present or future limits of the city of San Diego, a water supply, of a good quality, for domestic purposes, sufficient for the uses of the city of San Diego.” It was further agreed that, after deducting the operating expenses of the plants within the city, the proceeds of the sales of water should be divided between the parties in the proportion of 65-100 to the appellant, and 35-100 to the respondent, and it was provided that “operating expenses” should include necessary extensions of said plants; but it was also further provided that the said trustees should determine what were necessary and proper operating expenses. It was further provided that “this contract shall extend and be binding upon the parties hereto, their successors and assigns, for the term of twenty years, beginning on the 6th day of November, 1890.” There were other provisions in the said Exhibit B, which we do not deem necessary to be here mentioned. The parties commenced operating under this agreement of November 9th, and continued to so operate until about the 1st of June, 1891.

On the 13th day of April, 1891, the appellant entered into a written contract with Bryant Howard and several other persons, called “Exhibit 1,” by which the appellant, in its own name, leased to said Howard and others, for the term of 20 years from and after the 1st day of June, 1891, all their water plant within said city, including all pipes, pipe lines, etc., and also sold and conveyed to said Howard and others 3,000,000 gallons of water “from what is now known as the ‘San Diego Flume,’” for each and every 24 hours during said period of 20 years. (The said “water from what is now known as the 'San Diego Flume,' meant the said water supply of respondent, as above referred to.) By said contract, Howard and others agreed to pay to appellant, during said period, the sum of $9,165.65 per month, and the appellant agreed to accept in payment thereof the obligation of the city of San Diego to pay and satisfy the same. It was further agreed that after the construction of a certain railroad, afterwards in said contract mentioned, Howard and others should have the right to assign the whole lease to the city of San Diego, and that the appellant would look solely to said city for the carrying out of the agreement on the part of Howard and others. It was then stipulated that the lease was made upon the condition that the appellant should cause a railroad to be constructed and operated from the city of San Diego, Cal., to San Quintin, in the republic of Mexico, or to Fort Yuma, Cal., or its immediate vicinity, although it was also stated that "this provision shall not be construed as obligating the party of the first part to construct said road;" it being sufficient, under the contract, if the road should be built by some railroad company. It was further agreed that, should any extensions of the pipe lines or plant of appellant in said city be necessary, Howard and others, or their assigns or sublessees, should have the option to put in such extensions, or they could require appellant to make such extensions, in which case the appellant should be allowed for the amount expended in such extensions the sum of 6 per cent. per annum interest. It was also stipulated that, "for the deterioration of the extensions of the pipe lines." Howard and others should pay to appellant 3 per cent. per annum on the cost of such extensions; also, that Howard and others should have a right to terminate the lease in case any of the conditions, stipulations, or agreements therein mentioned should not be complied with by appellant. The contract, also, had a general provision that Howard and others might sublease to the city of San Diego. The contract last above referred to was made with the express understanding between the parties that Howard & Co. were to sublease to the city of San Diego, or to make a contract with said city by which Howard & Co. were to transfer to the city all the rights which they obtained under said contract with appellant; and in pursuance of said understanding, five days afterwards, to wit, on April 18, 1891, said Howard and others and said city did enter into a contract called "Exhibit 2." This contract referred to the said contract of April 13th, and provided that "this agreement is made upon the express condition that in case the contract above referred to shall be terminated under any of the conditions, stipulations, or agreements in said contract contained, then and in that case this contract shall at once cease and determine." This contract was substantially the same as the one made between appellant and Howard and others. By it Howard and others leased and sublet to the city, for the period of 20 years from and after June 1, 1891, all the said plant or system of water pipes owned by appellant in said city, and 3,000,000 gallons of water every 24 hours from the San Diego flume, and provided that the city should pay appellant for the same, as rental, $9,165.65 per month, which amounted to about $110,000 a year. It provided, also, for the 6 per cent. and 3 per cent. mentioned in said former contract, and provided, further, that, if the city desired more than 3,000,000 gallons per day, plaintiff should furnish the desired amount at the rate of 5 cents per 1,000 gallons. It also provided that the city should determine the amount of extensions to be made to said system of pipes. There were other provisions, which we do not deem it necessary to here notice.

There was some evidence tending to show that some of the directors and stockholders of the respondent had knowledge that the contract between Howard and others and appellant was to be made, and also that Howard and others were to make the said contract with the city, and did not object thereto, but rather encouraged the thing. There is no evidence, however, tending to show that the board of directors of the respondent, at any of its meetings, ever approved either of said contracts, or authorized any of its officers to take any action with respect to them. On the other hand, after the execution of said contract with the city, appellant requested the directors of the respondent to approve said contract, which the latter refused to do; and on the 18th of July, 1891, the directors of respondent passed a resolution, which, after reciting the various contracts, expressly repudiated the contracts made by appellant to Howard and others, and the contract between Howard and others and the city. And between the 1st of June, 1891, and the date of said resolution, the respondent did not receive any money from the appellant. After that, respondent continued to furnish water, as before, until the 2d of May, 1892, claiming, however, to be acting under the original contract of November 6, 1890; but there were continuous difficulties, disagreements, and troubles between the appellant and the respondent, and on the said May 2, 1892, respondent disconnected its water with the mains of the appellant, and refused to furnish any more, whereupon appellant brought this action to enjoin the respondent from thus shutting off the flow of water into the mains and pipes of appellant.

Upon the foregoing facts, counsel discussed a number of important questions, which, under our view, need not be here determined; but, in order to fully present the case, we will notice a few of such questions. Respondent contends, among other things, that the original agreement of November 6, 1890, was void because it was against public policy, in that its purpose was to prevent the city from acquiring its own water supply, and to obtain a monopoly of the business of furnishing water to the city for 20 years; because it undertook to take away from the directors of respondent all power over its business for 20 years, and to vest such power in two persons, one of whom was not even a member of the corporation respondent; because it undertook to form a partnership between the two corporations, and to consolidate said two corporations, which is not authorized, except in cases of railroad and mining corporations; and because the said contract was in other respects ultra vires, in the broadest sense. Respondent also contends that the contract between appellant and Howard and others was void in many respects, and particularly because it was made in contemplation of the city of San Diego taking the place of Howard and others, and that the contract between Howard & Co. and the city was void for many reasons, and particularly because, under the constitution of the state, it was the duty of the city to fix the rates of water furnished by appellant annually, and that the city had no right, by one act, to fix the rate of water for 20 years; also, because the city council could not grant a subsidy. All these propositions are contested by appellant. Some of the foregoing propositions are of very great importance, and their unnecessary determination here might furnish precedents which would foreclose or embarrass the rights of future litigants without a hearing. We will not, therefore, determine those questions, because we think that the judgment should be affirmed for another reason.

Assuming that the contract of November 6, 1890, is a valid one, still we think that the rights of the respondent must be determined upon that contract alone. That contract did not give to the appellant the right to make the contract with Howard and others; and certainly the contract between Howard and others and the city of San Diego is one which cannot bind respondent in any way, and the two last-named contracts are essentially different from the one of November, 1890. And one essential difference, which is important and substantial, so far as the rights of respondent are concerned, is that the latter contract gives to the city of San Diego the right to determine what extensions should be made to appellant's system of pipes,—what the operating expenses shall be,—while the contract of November, 1890, vests that power entirely in the two trustees named therein; and the result of the said provision of the later contracts was one of the principal causes of difference between the two parties. Moreover, the 6 per cent. and 3 per cent. items in the later contracts were essentially different from anything contained in the contract of 1890. And, as the appellant insisted upon its rights under the said contract with the city, the respondent had the right to stop furnishing its water; and appellant has no legal remedy by injunction to compel respondent to continue its supply of water, as provided for in the contract of November, 1890. And we do not think that the evidence shows any valid ratification of said latter contracts by respondent.

Appellant contends that, even if it be not entitled to an injunction, a nonsuit should not have been granted, but that the court should have gone on, and taken an accounting between the parties. The prayer of the complaint, in addition to asking an injunction, prays, also, for judgment against the respondent for $10,000 damages, and also "that the rights of plaintiff and the defendant as to the division of the money realized from the amount received from the city under said sublease be ascertained and determined." But, certainly, appellant showed no case for damages against the respondent; and, as the complaint proceeds upon the theory of the validity of the sublease to the city, we do not think that plaintiff is entitled to any accounting based upon the contract with the city. If it be true, as contended by appellant, that some of the members of the corporation respondent encouraged the contracts with Howard and others and with the city, appellant may have some cause to complain of a want of fair dealing; but, when corporate bodies are contracting with each other, they should keep in remembrance the old saying of Lord Coke, that corporations have no souls. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

HOLLAND v. SOUTHERN PAC. RY. CO.
(No. 18,128.)(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 8, 1893.)
INJURY TO EMPLOYEE—FELLOW SERVANTS—NOTICE OF PRIOR NEGLIGENCE.

The fact that an engineer once ran his train in 40 minutes over a distance scheduled for an hour, though he knew that hand cars and sectionmen might be on the track up to 10 minutes before schedule time, no accident having in fact occurred, does not show that he was unfit for his position, and that the company ought to have discharged him after notice.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yuba county; E. A. Davis, Judge.

Action by one Holland against the Southern Pacific Railway Company for damages for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

S. C. Denson, E. A. Forbes, and Fred Blake, for appellant. W. H. Carlin and Jacob Samuels, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff while in the employment of the defendant as a road master. The injuries were the result of a collision between a locomotive engine and a construction train upon which the plaintiff was riding. The engine which came in collision with the train was then being used in the work of defendant, and was driven by an engineer named Mulligan, employed by the defendant for that purpose. The complaint alleges that Mulligan, for some time prior to and up to the time of the collision, "had been and was incompetent, reckless, and grossly negligent in the performance of his duties as an engineer and * * * employe of defendant," and that defendant had notice of such incompetency and negligence. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict returned in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $7,500, and judgment was rendered in the superior court in accordance therewith. The defendant appeals.

The plaintiff and Mulligan were fellow servants, and, in order to entitle plaintiff to the verdict and judgment recovered in the superior court, it was incumbent upon him to show, not only that the injury he received was proximately caused by the negligence of Mulligan, but also that the latter was incompetent, and that there was negligence upon the part of the defendant in employing him in the first instance, or in retaining him in its service after notice of his incompetency and the alleged careless and reckless manner in which he had discharged his duties as an engineer. It is not claimed by the plaintiff that the defendant failed to exercise reasonable and ordinary care to ascertain whether or not Mulligan was a competent engineer at the time of first employing him, but he contends that the defendant was guilty of negligence in retaining him as an engineer after notice that he was careless and reckless in the discharge of the duties incident to that position, and therefore an unfit person to serve in such capacity. The jury so found, and the defendant insists that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, and the question thus presented is the only one necessary to be considered at this time.

It was shown upon the trial that, some three or four months prior to the collision resulting in the injury complained of by the plaintiff, Mulligan was the engineer in charge of one of defendant's trains running between Marysville and Oroville, and upon that occasion ran a train between Marysville and Moore's Station, a distance of 12 or 14 miles, in 40 minutes, while the schedule time between these points was 1 hour. The plaintiff himself testified that in making about 1½ miles of this run, over a portion of the road which was level, the train was driven at a speed of about 40 or 45 miles an hour; and he further testified that this road was not considered safe to run fast upon, because it was laid with light iron rails. There was but one train a day run over this road, but hand cars used by construction men might have been upon the track at this time, and, under the rules of defendant, would have had the right to remain there until within 10 minutes of the schedule time for the arrival of the regular train. This run was made in daylight, and without accident or injury to any one. The plaintiff, although requested by Mulligan not to do so, notified the proper officers of defendant of the manner in which this train was run upon the occasion just referred to. This was all the evidence tending in any degree to show the incompetency of Mulligan as an engineer prior to the collision in which plaintiff received his injuries. Counsel for plaintiff in their very able brief filed in this court argue that this evidence was sufficient to show that Mulligan knew, or ought to have known, that it was dangerous to run a train so fast upon this particular road; and that in so doing he not only endangered the lives of the passengers on the train, but also imperiled the lives of the section or construction men who were on the road, and who had the right to remain there until within 10 minutes of the time for the regular approach of the train, and that the jury were justified in finding from this single act of Mulligan that he was reckless and careless to such a degree as to render him wholly incompetent as an engineer; and that the defendant could not, with notice of the incompetency thus shown, retain him in its service as an engineer without rendering itself liable to those of its employes who might thereafter be injured through his negligence. But we do not think so. It may be, and doubtless is, true that a single act may be such as to furnish an unerring index of the character of the actor, and, when considered by itself and in connection with the circumstances surrounding it, be sufficient to demonstrate the unfitness of a person to be placed in any position requiring great or even ordinary care in the discharge of its duties. Still, the act relied upon here was not of a character to necessarily stamp Mulligan as unfit or incompetent to discharge the duties of an engineer. It did not of itself show him to be a grossly careless person, or reckless of the lives, either of the passengers committed to his charge, or the lives of the employes of defendant at work upon the track. No accident occurred at that time, nor is there anything in the evidence to show that this result was due more to chance or good fortune than the management of the engine and the actual condition of the road upon which the train was running; and, although men were liable to have been working on the track, it does not appear that they could not have been easily seen, and would not have had ample time to escape all harm after being warned by bell or whistle of the approach of the train. Upon the facts disclosed by the evidence, the jury was not warranted in finding that the defendant failed in its duty to plaintiff or its other employes in not discharging Mulligan from further service as an engineer because of this one act, assuming it to have been a negligent one. The true rule upon this subject is stated with great precision and clearness by Allen, J., in delivering the opinion of the court of appeals of the state of New York in the case of Baulec v. Railroad Co., 59 N. Y. 363, as follows: "An individual who by years of faithful service has shown himself trustworthy, vigilant, and competent is not disqualified for further employment, and proved either incompetent or careless and not trustworthy, by a single mistake or act of forgetfulness and omission to exercise the highest degree of caution and presence of mind. The fact would only show, what must be true of every human being, that the individual was capable of an act of negligence, forgetfulness, or error of judgment. This must be the case as to all employes of corporations until a race of servants can be found free from the defects and infirmities of humanity. A single act may, under some circumstances, show an individual to be an improper and unfit person for a position of trust or any particular service, as when such act is intentional and done wantonly, regardless of consequences, or maliciously. So the manner in which a specific act is performed may conclusively show the utter incompetency of the man and his inability to perform a particular service. But a single act of casual neglect does not, per se, tend to prove the party to be careless and imprudent, and unfitted for a position requiring care and prudence. Character is formed and qualities exhibited by a series of acts, and not by a single act." See, also, Elevator Co. v. Neal, 65 Md. 438, 5 Atl. Rep. 338. And in Wharton on Negligence (section 238) it is said: "If single exceptional acts of negligence should prove an officer to be incompetent, no officer could be retained in service, for there is no person who is not at some time to some degree negligent. Hence it has been properly held that intelligent men, of good habits, who are engineers or brakemen or switchmen on railroads, are not necessarily to be discharged by their employers for the first error or act of negligence such employes commit; nor will railroad companies necessarily be liable for a second error or negligent act of a servant to all other servants of such companies when the latter sustain damages by reason thereof." It necessarily follows from these views that the judgment and order appealed from must be reversed.

PHELAN et al. v. SMITH. (No. 19,147.)

COMMUNITY PROPERTY — CONVEYANCE OF HOMESTEAD RIGHT — EJECTMENT — OUSTER — ADMINISTRATION — INVENTORY — SETTING ASIDE HOMESTEAD.

1. Civil Code, §§ 1384, 1402, provide that on the death of a husband intestate the title to one-half of the community property vests in the surviving wife, subject to the debts and the control of the probate court for purposes of administration. Held, that the widow could not by a conveyance of her interest in the land bar a homestead therein for herself and children.

2. The latter clause of Code Civil Proc. § 1485, which defines the rights of successors by purchase to homesteads and to the right to have homesteads set apart to them, relates only to such purchasers as have succeeded to the rights of all the persons entitled to a homestead, but has no application where the succession is to the rights of only one of such persons.

3. In ejectment by a widow, who had sold her interest in community property, and by her daughter, to get possession of their homestead right, defendant cannot contend that he has not contested the right of the daughter to possession as a tenant in common with him, so that there has been no ouster, when the complaint avers title in plaintiffs and ouster by defendant, and the answer denies every material allegation of the complaint, and pleads the statute of limitations, and when the agreed statement of facts admits that on a given date the widow, on behalf of herself and daughter, demanded of defendant that they be let in possession, but that defendant refused, and has since withheld possession from plaintiffs.

4. Where the affidavit of the administratrix, attached to the inventory and appraisal, was almost in the precise language prescribed by the Code, except that the affidavit reads "and of all just claims of the said deceased against the said decedent," instead of "against the said affiant," such affidavit was sufficient, the error being merely clerical, and it could not in any way vitiate the subsequent proceedings.

5. The clause in Code Civil Proc. § 1443, requiring the administrator to file his inventory and appraisal within three months after his appointment is directory, and does not render them invalid when subsequently filed.

6. The fact that a second inventory was filed did not affect the validity of the proceedings, for, if the first was in proper form, and the second involved no changes, it was mere surplusage; but if, from the destruction of some property or the discovery of more, the court wished a further inventory, it was within its power to order one taken.

7. The petition for a homestead asked that it be set apart for the widow and her two children, but the decree stated that the property described "is hereby set apart for the use of the family of said O., deceased." The family of O. was shown by the record to have consisted of the widow and two minor children. Held that, as the term "family" is used throughout the chapter providing for homesteads to denote the surviving husband or wife and children, it must be regarded as used in the decree in that sense, and as sufficiently describing the widow and children.

8. Objections to a decree setting apart a homestead urged on an appeal in an ejectment suit, a collateral proceeding, can only avail by showing such errors as render the decree absolutely void.

9. Even if the probate proceedings were void, the infant plaintiff could still recover, as the heir of her deceased father, (Code Civil Proc. § 1452), her interest in the real property, and possession thereof, except as against the administrator.

10. Evidence was properly excluded that after the death of her husband the widow purchased with her separate funds a lot in another town, and resided there with her children, and declared a homestead thereon, which lot was subsequently sold by her, before the application for a homestead herein, for the right to a homestead herein inured to her and her children as a joint right which she could not individually waive.

11. The possession of defendant under the agreement to purchase, made by the widow in 1883, was in subordination to plaintiffs' title, and did not become adverse to either of them until the date of the deed September 1, 1885, and, as the ejectment action was begun April 11, 1890, less than five years after the execution of the deed, it was not barred by the statute of limitations.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William P. Wade, Judge.

Ejectment by Maggie Phelan and Mary O'Connor against Edward Smith. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

O'Melveny & Henning, for appellant. W. I. Foley and Chapman & Hendrick, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is an action of ejectment to recover a parcel of land situate in the county of Los Angeles. Plaintiffs had judgment, from which, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. The parcel of land in question is part of a larger tract, of which John O'Connor died seised July 21, 1882. The entire tract was community property of John O'Connor and Maggie O'Connor, (now Maggie Phelan,) his wife. John O'Connor died intestate, and left him surviving the said Maggie, his widow, and their two minor children, Louis Francis, who died intestate, a minor, without issue, February 22, 1889, and the plaintiff, Mary O'Connor, who is still a minor. Maggie O'Connor was on the 13th day of October, 1882, appointed guardian of the person and estate of her infant daughter, Mary O'Connor, and on the 8th of November, 1882, she was duly appointed administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, and qualified as such administratrix. On the 14th of April, 1883, Maggie O'Connor entered into an agreement with the defendant, Edward Smith, and his brother, W. D. Smith, whereby she agreed to convey to them a tract of land consisting of $9\frac{3}{4}$ acres, which includes the land involved in this action. The consideration was \$3,000. W. D. Smith assigned his interest in the contract to defendant, and, the consideration therefor having been paid, on the 1st day of September, 1885, Maggie O'Connor conveyed the undivided one-half of the land by deed of grant to the defendant. The land so conveyed was community property, as aforesaid, and belonged to the estate of John O'Connor, deceased. No order or authority of the probate court was had, either authorizing or approving such sale, and it was made by Maggie O'Connor individually, and not in any representative character. Defendant went into possession of the land at the date of the agreement, by consent of Maggie O'Connor, and since the date of the conveyance has remained in possession, claiming title to an undivided one-half thereof under said deed, and not otherwise, adversely to plaintiffs, and has paid all taxes levied thereon. On July 9, 1888, the land was appraised as of the estate of John O'Connor, deceased, in two parcels. The first parcel, being the land in dispute in this action, was appraised at \$4,500, and the second parcel at \$3,500. On the 18th day of August, 1888, said Maggie O'Connor, as administratrix of the estate of John O'Connor, deceased, filed her petition in the superior court asking that parcel one of the land aforesaid, with the dwelling house thereon, be set apart by said court as a homestead for the use of said Maggie O'Connor, widow, as aforesaid, and her two minor children, aforesaid, and such proceedings were thereafter had that on the 18th day of August, 1888, said first parcel of land, with the dwelling house, etc., thereon, was set apart by the court as a homestead. After the death of Louis Francis O'Connor, and on the 15th day of August, 1889, a decree of distribution in the matter of said estate was given and made, by which decree three-fourths of said estate was awarded and distributed to Maggie O'Connor, the widow, and one-fourth part thereof to Mary O'Connor, the surviving child. Maggie O'Connor, on the 11th day of March, 1889, married E. F. Phelan, and still is the wife of said Phelan.

Appellant contends that as against the plaintiff Maggie Phelan the deed of September 1, 1885, from her to him, divested her of all title she had to the land, and that she had the one-half thereof, under section 1402 of the Civil Code. That if the decree of the court setting aside the homestead out of the estate of John O'Connor vested any new interest or estate in said Maggie, the same inured to her grantee, and that the homestead decree is not sufficient to enable her to maintain ejectment against her grantee. "Upon the death of the husband, one-half of the community property goes to the surviving wife. * * * In case of the dissolution of the community by the death of the husband, the entire community property is equally subject to his debts, the family allowance and the charges and expenses of administration." Civil Code, § 1402. We assume at the outset of the inquiry that whatever title Maggie O'Connor could at the date of her deed convey to defendant in and to the undivided one-half of the property in question passed to the latter by her deed. Her deed being in form and substance one of grant, an after-acquired title, vesting in her as an individual, and which she could convey as such, passed by operation of law to her grantee under such deed. It remains to inquire as to her capacity to convey an interest in the community property of her deceased husband, pending proceedings in administration, and the limitations, if any, attaching to the title conveyed. "The property, both real and personal, of one who dies without disposing of it by will passes to the heirs of the intestate, subject to the control of the probate court, and to the possession of any administrator appointed by that court for the purposes of administration." Civil Code, § 1384. The title to one-half of the community property, under sections 1384 and 1402 of the Civil Code, upon the death of the husband who dies intestate, at once vests in the surviving wife, subject to the payment of debts, etc., and subject to the exercise by the probate court of the powers over it, vested in that court, and qualified or subject to be qualified by the exercise of those powers. The objects of administration were discussed at considerable length in Estate of Moore, 57 Cal. 437. That case, like the present, was one in which the husband died intestate, leaving community property, and one in which there had been no homestead declared during the lives of the spouses. The widow had there, as here, conveyed her interest in the real property; the only difference being that in that case it was by quitclaim deed while here it is by grant. She subsequently applied to have a homestead for herself and children carved out of the real estate so conveyed. The court below refused her application. On appeal, this court, in reversing the order denying a homestead, said: "The deed of Mrs. Moore is silent upon the subject of homestead. Whatever its effect as a conveyance, it was no more than to convey the interest in the property of the deceased which she received upon his death by succession. A homestead right, or a right to have a homestead, is not a right which vests under the law by succession. It is a right bestowed by the beneficence of the law of this estate for the benefit of the family. Upon the death of an intestate his property goes by succession to his heirs, subject to administration. The objects of administration are: (1) To support the family for a period; (2) to set apart a homestead to the family; (3) to pay the expenses of administration; (4) to pay the debts of the deceased; (5) to distribute the balance of the estate to those who take it by law. If an heir convey his interest in the estate, or any part thereof, he conveys such interest only as will remain to him after satisfying the first four objects above named, unless the deed should in terms expressly cover more. Setting apart a homestead is a part of the probate proceeding, as much as is a family allowance. * * * The homestead, when set apart, is to be set apart for the benefit of the widow and children. * * * It certainly could not be said that her deed, conveying her interest as successor, would interfere with and defeat the purpose of the law in giving the family an abiding place." In re Lahiff's Estate, 86 Cal. 151, 24 Pac. Rep. 850; Estate of Moore, 57 Cal. 446. The right to have a probate homestead carved out of the estate is in the nature of a charge upon the estate, from which the widow, under her right of succession, could no more discharge than she could free the estate from its liability for the debts of her deceased husband. The right is inherent, not in her alone, but in the children as well; and she can no more foreclose their right thereto than she can their rights as heirs to the estate. It is conferred for the beneficent purpose of affording a home in which the minor children may be sheltered and shielded from want. To hold that the widow, or any less than all the parties in interest, can by a conveyance defeat the object of the law, would be a fraud upon the rights of those not joining in such conveyance. To say that the widow may convey her right to such a homestead, and that the grantee takes as a tenant in common with the children, is in effect to say there shall be no homestead. The law consecrates the homestead to a specific purpose, and that purpose can only be accomplished by making it a home for the family. It must be held that the latter clause of section 1485 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which defines the rights of successors by purchase to homesteads, and to the right to have homesteads set apart to them, relates only to such purchasers as have succeeded to the rights of all the persons entitled to a homestead, and has no application to a case like the present, where defendant has succeeded to the right of one only of such persons. It follows that the widow's conveyance was subject to the homestead right which it was the duty of the court to set apart, and, when so consummated, the title which she had conveyed, if not defeated, was, as to the rights of defendant, at least suspended during the period of the occupancy of the property as a homestead. Whether establishing the status of the property as a homestead had the effect of defeating the title conveyed to defendant in toto, or only to hold it in abeyance, involves considerations of deep importance which are not necessary to the decision of this case, and upon which no opinion is expressed. The contention of appellant that he has not contested the right of plaintiff Mary O'Connor to possession as a tenant in common with him, cannot be, on the face of the record, maintained.

The complaint avers title in plaintiffs and ouster by defendant. The answer denies each and every material allegation of the complaint, and pleads the bar of the statute of limitations. The denial of title of a cotenant in an answer is equivalent to an ouster. Greer v. Tripp, 56 Cal. 209; Spect v. Gregg, 51 Cal. 198; Packard v. Johnson, Id. 545; Miller v. Myles, 46 Cal. 535. Furthermore, the agreed statement of facts admits as follows: "On the 15th day of March, 1890, the plaintiff, the said Maggie Phelan, on behalf of herself and said Mary O'Connor, demanded of the said defendant that they be let into possession of the said property first herein specifically described, and so set apart as a homestead; and the said defendant refused, and has ever since withheld the possession of said property from the plaintiff." This was abundantly sufficient evidence of ouster and refusal to deliver possession on demand. Demand and refusal of possession are not ouster, but they are such evidence as will authorize a court to find an ouster.

To the introduction of the probate proceedings in the matter of the estate of John O'Connor, deceased, purporting to show the appraisal and inventory of the estate, the order setting apart the homestead, and the decree of distribution, the defendant objected, and the action of the court in admitting the evidence is assigned as error as follows: (1) That the appraisements (there were two) are invalid, because not verified by the administratrix as required by section 1449, Code Civil Proc. (2) The appraisal was not returned within three months, as required by section 1443, Id. (3) There is no authority for appraising one parcel of land in two parcels "for the purpose of homestead" or for any other purpose. (4) There was no authority for appointment of the last set of appraisers, unless the first appraisal was invalid. If the first appraisal is invalid, it was because of the insufficient affidavit of the administratrix, and, if this is so, the second is equally invalid, because not showing by affidavit of administratrix that all the estate was appraised, or what debts were owing by the affiant to deceased. (5) Error in admitting in evidence the decree of distribution, which is invalid for the reason that no valid appraisal or valid inventory was ever made or had, and because such decree does not affect the title of defendant or his right to possession. So far as the infant plaintiff, Mary O'Connor, is concerned, none of these proceedings can affect her right to recover. If the probate proceedings are void, she may still, as the heir of her deceased father, recover her interest in the real property, and possession thereof, except as against the administrator. Code Civil Proc. § 1452. The affidavit of the administratrix, indorsed upon or attached to the second inventory and appraisal, is almost in the precise language of section 1449 of the Code of Civil Procedure, except that in the final sentence the last word is "decedent" instead of "affiant," thus making the affidavit read "and of all just claims of the said deceased against the said decedent" instead of "against the said affiant." This is a mere clerical error, which could not in any wise vitiate the subsequent proceedings. The object of requiring an affidavit by the administrator or executor to accompany the inventory and appraisal is, apparently, not to give any validity to the inventory as such, but to furnish evidence that it contains all the property within the knowledge and possession of the affiant; thus serving as a check upon the administrator. We have no doubt that, as a basis for action by the court in setting apart a homestead, an inventory and appraisal without any affidavit by the administrator, as provided for in section 1449, Code Civil Proc., would be quite sufficient. The clause in the Code under which the administrator is required to file an inventory and appraisal within three months after his appointment is directory, and does not render them invalid when subsequently filed. So, too, the filing of a second inventory is of no moment. If the first is in proper form, and the second involves no additions or changes, it is mere surplusage; but it may often occur from the discovery of other property, the destruction or loss of a portion of the property, and from various other causes, that a second or further inventory and appraisal is desirable. In all such cases the court, under the powers conferred upon it, may, we have no doubt, inform itself by means of a new or further inventory and appraisal of the true condition of the estate.

In the present instance we may well conclude the court desired a segregation of the property for homestead purposes. This was proper. The Code does not point out the steps to be pursued in setting apart a homestead where none has been declared by the husband and wife, or one of them, during the lives of the parties; and in such cases the court may adopt any suitable method of procedure conformable to the spirit of the Code. Code Civil Proc., § 187.

It was important for the court to be informed as to the value of the homestead which it was its duty under the law to set apart. It is objected that the decree setting apart the homestead is invalid, on account of the appraisal and inventory not being regular, and for the further reason that "it does not set the property apart to the widow and minor children, but to the family; and it does not purport to set apart for a limited period, but purports to set it apart absolutely," etc. It is only where a homestead is set apart from the separate property of the deceased that it is required to be for a limited period. Code Civil Proc. § 1468. The petition for a homestead asked that it be set apart for the widow and her two children. In the decree the language used is that the property (describing it) "is hereby set apart for the use of the family of said John O'Connor, deceased." The family of John O'Connor, deceased, is shown by the record to have consisted of the widow and two children. The term "family" is used in the chapter providing for homesteads in the sense of denoting the surviving wife and children. It relates to "the provision for the support of the family and of the homestead." Section 1464 provides that the widow or children may remain in possession of the homestead, "of all the wearing apparel of the family," etc. Section 1466 requires the court to make allowance for the maintenance of the family. Section 1468 provides that when property "is set apart to the use of the family," etc. If the estate is of less value than $1,500, and there be a widow or minor children, the court shall require parties interested to show cause why it should not be set apart for the use of the family. Section 1469. The term "family" throughout the chapter is used as synonymous with and as representing the surviving wife or husband and children, if any. When the court used the term "family" in its decree we must hold that it expresses the meaning and is used in the sense of the statute, and is therefore sufficiently explicit to describe the widow and children.

We have referred to these several objections as if they were presented on an appeal from the decree setting apart the homestead, but it must be borne in mind that this is a collateral attack upon those proceedings, and can only avail by showing such errors as render the decree not voidable, but absolutely void. Kearney v. Kearney, 72 Cal. 592, 15 Pac. Rep. 769; Gruwell v. Seybolt, 82 Cal. 10, 22 Pac. Rep. 938; Leach v. Pierce, 93 Cal. 618, 29 Pac. Rep. 235; Estate of Maxwell, 74 Cal. 385, 16 Pac. Rep. 206; Code Civil Proc. § 1908, subd. 1; 1 Freem. Judgm. § 319b. The court did not err in ruling out as immaterial and irrelevant the evidence that, after the death of her husband, Maggie O'Connor purchased with her separate funds a lot of land in the town of Pomona, and resided upon the same with her children, and declared a homestead thereon, which lot was sold under a foreclosure sale, and subsequently redeemed and sold by her before the application for a homestead herein. If, as before stated, the right to a homestead herein was one which inured to her and her children jointly, which she could not individually convey or waive, because of such joint right, then this evidence was not admissible, as the only effect of it would be to show a waiver on her part. For like reasons there is nothing in the decree of distribution, entered long after the homestead was set aside, which could have a bearing upon the action of the court in the homestead matter, or affect the rights of the plaintiffs thereunder. The possession of defendant under the agreement of April 14, 1883, was in subordination to the title of plaintiffs, and did not become adverse to plaintiffs, or either of them, until the date of the deed of September 1, 1885. This action was commenced April 11, 1890, less than five years after the execution of the deed; hence the cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

STORY & ISHAM COMMERCIAL CO. v.
STORY et al. (No. 19,015.)

COUNTERCLAIM — CONVERSION — DAMAGES — JOINT DEFENDANTS — DEFENSE AS TO ONE.

1. Defendant agreed to pay the debts of plaintiff corporation, and, as security, plaintiff conveyed to her all its notes and accounts, merchandise on hand, and all its property, with certain exceptions. It was agreed that plaintiff should endeavor to sell the merchandise, and apply the receipts to the payment of defendant, and that the property conveyed to defendant should not be sold at less than its cost to plaintiff, without the consent of plaintiff's directors. Subsequently, defendant, without plaintiff's knowledge, sold a portion of the goods, and plaintiff sued for conversion. Defendant, for answer, set up the whole agreement; alleged performance on her part, and that there was due her, above the value of the property sold, a large sum; and prayed an accounting. Held, that such answer was a proper counterclaim, within Code Civil Proc. § 438, providing that "a cause of action arising out of the same transaction" may be so set up, and the fact that plaintiff alleged no facts to show that the counterclaim arose out of the same transaction did not prevent defendant from setting out the entire transaction, and thus showing the relation of her claim thereto.

2. The action being to recover the value of the goods, and not the goods themselves, the right of defendant to assert a lien thereon was not involved, so that Civil Code, § 2910, providing that the wrongful conversion of personal property by a person holding a lien thereon extinguishes the lien, had no application, for, by its choice in its form of action, plaintiff adopted the sale, and affirmed the title thereby conveyed.

3. The trial court found that, at all times after making the agreement, defendant claimed to be the owner of the property mentioned therein, so that her making the sale was in pursuance of her construction of its terms. The court also found that she made the sale on an agreement by her vendee that he would pay the price on the debts of plaintiff for which she had become liable. Held, that the agreement itself not being free from ambiguity, and defendant having acted according to her construction of it, while, if her construction was wrong, and plaintiff suffered thereby, it had a cause of action against her, yet it could not recover damages independent of an adjustment of their respective rights under the entire agreement.

4. Where the liability of a number of defendants for conversion, if any exists, is several as well as joint, a defense set up by one that will defeat plaintiff's recovery is available for the other defendants.

Action by the Story & Isham Commercial Company, a corporation, against Adella B. Story and others, for the alleged conversion of certain goods. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, and both parties appeal. Reversed.

Mr. Works and M. S. Babcock, for plaintiff. Luce & McDonald and Sprigg & Barber, for defendant.

HARRISON, J. In February, 1891, the plaintiff, being largely indebted to Mrs. Adella B. Story, defendant, and also to other creditors, made an agreement with her as follows: "Whereas, Mrs. A. B. Story has agreed to pay all the debts existing against the Story & Isham Commercial Company on the 1st day of February, 1891, including those payable to herself; and whereas, said Story & Isham Commercial Company desires to secure said Mrs. Story for the payments made and to be made by her on account of the said debts; Now, therefore, in consideration of said agreement and the payment of said debts, the said Story & Isham Commercial Company, pursuant to a resolution of its board of directors at a meeting thereof duly called and had, hereby agrees to pay to said Mrs. A. B. Story all sums paid or agreed to be paid by her on account of said debts, including costs and expenses, notes, attorneys' fees, and judgments, and such things as she may pay on account of said debts, and in procuring the money with which to meet the same. And, as security for the payment of said sums, the Story & Isham Commercial Company agrees to and does sell, assign, convey, and transfer to said Mrs. A. B. Story all notes, accounts, and other demands due or payable to said company, and all goods and merchandise on hand, in store or in transit, owned by it, and all other property owned by it, at law or in equity, excepting, however, that said company reserves the right to use in its business the first sums collected by it, either on sales made or demands due, not exceeding $2,000, and also reserves the real estate owned by it; but all sums realized from a sale, pledge, or mortgage thereof, not exceeding $2,000, shall be applied as a payment on the sums payable to said Mrs. A. B. Story, as above specified. Said Commercial Company shall use its best efforts to realize as soon as practicable on said demands and merchandise, and apply the sums received therefor on the sums payable to said Mrs. A. B. Story, as herein provided. The expense of running the said company shall be divided between the old business and the new in proportion to the sales made on account of the goods hereby sold to Mrs. Story and those sold on account of transactions subsequent to February 1, 1891. The property hereby conveyed to Mrs. A. B. Story shall not be sold at less than it cost the Commercial Company, without a direction of the board of directors of said company. Executed and delivered this 5th day of February, 1891. The Story & Isham Commercial Co. Per A. H. Isham, Vice Pres. and Mgr. Adella B. Story." At that time the plaintiff was engaged in the business of merchandising, and was owner of certain personal property, which it had in its custody, and which was included in the aforesaid agreement. On the 26th of February, 1891, Mrs. Story, without the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff, sold to the defendant Bates a portion of said personal property, who took possession thereof without the consent of the plaintiff, and afterwards sold and disposed of the same. On the 2d of March, 1891, the plaintiff brought this action against the defendants for the conversion of the personal property so conveyed by Mrs. Story to the defendant Bates. The defendants, in their answer, set up the foregoing agreement, and the circumstances under which it was made, alleging performance by Mrs. Story of her part of the agreement, and that she had paid out on account of the debts of the plaintiff the sum of about $115,000, and that there was due to her, above the value of the property which she had sold to Bates, upwards of $50,000, and prayed for an accounting, and judgment in her favor against the plaintiff. The court finds that the cost price of the property sold by Mrs. Story to Bates was $38,550; that that was also the value of the same; that at the time when she sold the goods the plaintiff was indebted to her in the sum of $24,206; and that she had also caused debts of the plaintiff, to the amount of $5,523, to be satisfied by having its creditors accept in satisfaction of said debts certificates of deposit issued therefor by the California National Bank of San Diego. The court also found "that by an arrangement between the defendant Adella B. Story and the California National Bank the said bank, on the 26th day of February, 1891, canceled, and marked 'Paid,' notes of the plaintiff held by said bank in the sum of $15,200, and the same were thereby paid;" and also that, after the sale and taking of said property, she had paid the balance of the debts of the plaintiff, amounting, with the sum paid and amounts due her, to $113,000, a portion of which was paid out of the proceeds of the property sold by her to Bates. Upon these findings the court made its conclusions of law that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendants the value of the property converted by them, with interest thereon, amounting to $40,678.79, less $29,717.54, the amount, with interest thereon, due from the plaintiff to Mrs. Story, and the amount for which she had caused its debts to be satisfied by the certificates of deposit issued by the bank, and that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment in the sum of $10,961.25, and rendered judgment accordingly. From this judgment, both parties have appealed,—the plaintiff, upon the ground that the court erred in allowing any deductions from the value of the goods sold by Mrs. Story to Bates; and the defendants, on the ground that Mrs. Story should have been allowed the entire amount of her payments for the plaintiff, and should have had a judgment in her favor for the difference between that amount and the value of the goods.

It is contended by the plaintiff, in the first place, that the matters set forth in the answer do not constitute a counterclaim to the cause of action set forth in the complaint, and were not available as a defense thereto. Section 438, Code Civil Proc., provides that the counterclaim which the defendant is permitted to plead "must be one existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of one of the following causes of action: (1) A cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action." One of the definitions given by the Century Dictionary to the term "transaction," is "a matter or affair, either completed or in course of completion." Mr. Pomeroy, in his treatise on Remedies and Remedial Rights, (section 774,) defines the term, as used in this section, to be "that combination of acts and events, circumstances and defaults which, viewed in one aspect, results in the plaintiff's right of action, and, viewed in another aspect, results in the defendant's right of action," and says, further: 'As these two opposing rights cannot be exactly the same, it follows that there may be, and generally must be, acts, facts, events, and defaults, in the transaction as a whole, which do not enter into each cause of action, but are confined to one of them alone.' See also, Bank v. Lee, 7 Abb. Fr. 372; Ritchie v. Hayward, 71 Mo. 560; Judah v. Trustees, 16 Ind. 60. Every transaction is more or less complex, consisting of various facts and acts done by the respective parties; and it frequently happens that one or more of these acts would, if viewed by itself, be such a violation of duty as to give to the other a right of action, but the obligation thus created may be so counterbalanced by other matters growing out of the same transaction that no compensation ought to be made therefor. While the parties are carrying their agreement into execution, and mutual rights and obligations accrue by reason of the failure of either or both of them to comply strictly with its terms, neither party should have the right, so long as the agreement is in force, and is in process of execution, to recover the damage sustained by him from any breach of duty by the other, without at the same time satisfying any obligation against himself growing out of the same affair. In such a case the rights of the one are so dependent upon the rights of the other, that simple equity requires that the respective causes of action in behalf of each should be adjusted in a single suit. From an early day the tendency of judicial decisions has been to avoid circuitry of action and multiplicity of suits, by permitting matters growing out of the same transaction, which might constitute an independent cause of action, to be given in evidence by way of defense; and the foregoing section of the Code of Civil Procedure is an additional legislative step in the direction of this judicial tendency. As a corollary therefrom, it follows that the form in which the plaintiff may set out his cause of action ought not to be conclusive upon the right of the defendant to set forth his counterclaim in his answer. The plaintiff is to set forth the facts which constitute his cause of action; but, if the other facts in the transaction are so connected with those set forth as to defeat their legal effect, the defendant is not precluded from setting them up by reason of the form which the plaintiff may have chosen for presenting his own side of the case. Pom. Rem. & Rem. Rights, § 772; Gordon v. Bruner, 49 Mo. 570; Brady v. Brennan, 25

Minn. 210; Bitting v. Thaxton, 72 N. C. 549; Thompson v. Kessel, 30 N. Y. 383; Chandler v. Childs, 42 Mich. 128, 3 N. W. Rep. 297. It is for the purpose of enabling the court to render a judgment by which the rights of the parties may be finally determined in the same action, rather than to compel another action, that the Code permits a defendant to set up in his answer any new matter arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim; and, if the plaintiff omits or fails to set forth in his complaint the entire transaction out of which his claim arose, the defendant may supplement this omission by setting forth in his answer the omitted facts, so that the entire transaction may be before the court. The plaintiff is not at liberty to select an isolated act or fact, which is only one of a series of acts or steps in the entire transaction, and insist upon a judgment on this fact alone, if the fact is so connected with others that it forms only a portion of the transaction. The transaction which was the foundation of the cause of action set forth in the complaint herein is not limited to the facts therein set forth, but includes the entire series of acts and mutual conduct of the parties in the business or proceeding between them which formed the basis of their written agreement. If the plaintiff had set out in its complaint the entire transaction between it and Mrs. Story, beginning with the agreement, and the circumstances under which it was made, and giving in detail her sale of the property to Bates, that its value was $38,550, and that the proceeds thereof had been applied by her in payment of its debts, and also showing that in pursuance of said agreement she had paid the entire debts of the plaintiff, amounting to $113,000, it would then have appeared, upon the face of the complaint, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover from her the value of the property sold by her, without at the same time recompensing her for the payments that she had made for its account. If, on the other hand, Mrs. Story had brought an action against the plaintiff for the amount of money paid by her under the agreement, the plaintiff would have had the right to deduct from that amount the value of the property sold by her, and it would not have lain in her mouth to say that she was a trespasser, and therefore not liable to have her tort set off against the contract of the plaintiff. But the rights of the several parties to plead a counterclaim in defense to an action by one against the other for a breach of their respective obligations arising out of the facts in controversy between them must be reciprocal. The entire transaction between them, and the rights resulting therefrom, are to be determined by the court; and it is incumbent upon the court, after hearing all the proof relative to that transaction, to render such judgment as may be consistent with the case, as presented by both parties.

Much of the argument of the plaintiff has been directed to the terms of section 2910, Civil Code, which provide that the wrongful conversion of personal property by a person holding a lien thereon extinguishes the lien. But, as this action is brought to recover the value of the goods, and not for the goods themselves, the right of the defendant to assert a lien thereon is not involved. If the plaintiff had brought its action against Mrs. Story to recover possession of the goods, the effect of this section would have properly arisen; but, by bringing it for the value of the goods, he adopts her sale, and affirms the title conveyed thereby. It is a well-established principle that when one has converted to his own use, or sold, the goods of another, the latter may waive the tort, and sue in assumpsit. It is immaterial in which mode he seeks redress for the wrong. In either case, he can claim only a pecuniary compensation; and whether he claim this in assumpsit, as upon a sale, or for the value of the goods, as by conversion, he establishes only a pecuniary obligation, which the defendant may controvert by any facts connected with the transaction out of which the plaintiff's claim arose. The form in which the plaintiff brought the present action is immaterial, as it might have treated the defendant as having received the proceeds of the goods sold by her, and sued her therefor. But, whatever form of action it might select, it was only entitled to compensation for the goods, and, in a suit for the taking, it could only receive the amount in which it had been damaged. By its agreement with Mrs. Story, it had appropriated this property to the payment of its obligation to her; and in the absence of any finding or any claim by it that it has suffered diminution of estate or damage beyond the value of the property, if that value was appropriated by her to the purpose to which the parties had agreed it should be appropriated, it cannot claim any further compensation from her. By its agreement with her, it placed itself under an obligation to her for the payment of all the moneys which she should advance for its debts; and, as the court finds that she has paid therefor the sum of $113,000, it can only claim that the value of the property sold by her be deducted from that amount. By treating the goods as the property of the defendant, and suing merely for their value, the plaintiff has elected to treat the obligation as of a fixed value, and it is immaterial in what form it stated its cause of action. In either case, it would be competent for Mrs. Story to show that by virtue of the agreement between them the property had been subjected to the payment of the plaintiff's obligation to her, and that she had made such application, and to ask that the remainder of the unperformed part of the contract should be enforced.

The court finds that, at all times after making the said agreement, Mrs. Story claimed that by virtue thereof she had become the owner of the property mentioned therein, and it follows that her making a sale of it to Bates was in pursuance of her construction of its terms. The further finding of the court that her sale was made to Bates with the agreement on his part that he would pay the cost price of said property on the debts of the plaintiff for which she had become liable also supports the position that she made the sale in purported compliance with the terms of the agreement. The agreement itself is not free from ambiguity, and it is not an unnatural construction that it was the intention of the parties that after its execution the goods should remain in the custody of the plaintiff, and that either party should have the right to sell and dispose of the same, and that all sales made by either party should be applied in reduction of the debts of the plaintiff that had been assumed by Mrs. Story. Her claim to have become the owner of the property by virtue of the agreement must be assumed to have been made by her in good faith, and there is no finding of force or oppression, or of any willful wrong, out of which a right to any punitive damages could accrue to the plaintiff. It is clear from the findings that Mrs. Story was not acting in any repudiation of the agreement by which the property was conveyed to her, but in accordance with her own construction of its effect. If that construction was erroneous, so that the plaintiff suffered loss thereby, the result of such construction may have given the plaintiff a cause of action against Mrs. Story; but it does not follow that it is entitled to recover damages from her independent of an adjustment of their respective rights under the entire agreement. Mrs. Story had a cause of action against the plaintiff for the money paid by her in releasing it from its debts, and this cause of action "arose out of"—that is, it resulted from—the same transaction or negotiation as did the plaintiff's right to compensation for the goods which were sold by her to Bates. Both had their origin in the agreement between them for the payment by her of the debts, and the appropriation by the plaintiff of its property as a mode of reimbursing her, and the sale of the goods by her, as well as her payment of the debts, were only separate acts in carrying out the terms of their agreement, and completing this transaction. The act of Mrs. Story in making a sale to Bates of the property described in the complaint was so connected with the business referred to in the agreement between her and the plaintiff, that the entire transaction must be considered, in order to determine whether her act was wrongful or right; and, even if it should be held that the sale to Bates was not specifically authorized by the terms of the agreement, it is clear from the findings of the court that it was not done in any repudiation of the agreement. She purported to act under, and not in antagonism to, the agreement, so that the plaintiff's right of action would be for damages resulting from a breach of a portion of the agreement, rather than for an invasion by her of its rights, independent of and disconnected with the obligation created by the agreement.

The contention of the plaintiff that, inasmuch as this action is brought against the three defendants, a cause of action existing in favor of Mrs. Story alone is not available as a defense, cannot be maintained. The liability of the defendants, if any existed, is several, as well as joint; and, if Mrs. Story could set up any defense that would defeat the plaintiff's right of recovery, it was available for the other defendants. Whatever shows that the plaintiff had no right of recovery, as against Mrs. Story, protects the other defendants, who were acting under her and by her authority.

The sum of $15,200, which the court finds is the amount of the debts of the plaintiff which Mrs. Story caused to be paid on the same day that she sold the goods to Bates by an arrangement between her and the California National Bank, added to the $29,717.54, which the court also finds was due her from the plaintiff at that time, shows that she had then paid more than the entire value of the goods, and consequently she should not be charged with any interest upon that value. As the court finds that Mrs. Story had fully complied with her part of the agreement, it follows that judgment should have been rendered in her favor for the difference between the amount paid by her for the account of the plaintiff, and the value of the goods sold by her to Bates; and the judgment of the court below is reversed, with directions to enter judgment against the plaintiff, and in favor of Mrs. Story, for the sum of $74,450, with her costs of suit, as of the 10th day of December, 1891.

STORY v. STORY & ISHAM COMMERCIAL CO. et al. (No. 19,077.)

RES JUDICATA—PENDING ACTION—EFFECT AS BAR.

Under Code Civil Proc. § 1049, declaring that "an action is to be deemed pending from the time of its commencement until its final determination upon appeal, or until the time for appeal has passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied," the judgment cannot, during such time, be pleaded in bar of another action.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Action by Adella B. Story against the Story & Isham Commercial Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Luce & McDonald and Sprigg & Barber, for appellant. Mr. Works and M. S. Babcock, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action is closely connected with the action of Story & Isham Commercial Co. v. Story, (No. 19,015,) 34 Pac. Rep. 671, (this day decided,) and was argued and submitted to the court at the same time. After the former action had been brought against the present plaintiff she commenced the present action for the purpose, among others, of restraining the defendants from interfering with the property conveyed to her by the agreement, of which a copy is set forth in the opinion in that case, and to have the demands and choses in action that had been assigned to her thereby sold or collected under the direction of the court, and applied in payment of the indebtedness of the corporation to herself. The two actions were pending in different departments of the superior court in the county of San Diego, and the action in which the present appellant was defendant was tried first, and judgment therein rendered against her December 10, 1891. Thereafter, the corporation defendant filed a supplemental answer herein, pleading the judgment in the other action as a bar to the plaintiff's right of recovery; and upon the submission of the cause, December 23, 1891, the court made its finding to that effect, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendants. From that judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

The court erred in holding that the judgment rendered in the other action was a bar to the plaintiff's right of recovery for the moneys paid by her under the agreement. At the time that the court made its decision in the present case, the other action was still pending, (section 1049, Code Civil Proc.,) and while that action was so pending the judgment rendered therein could not be a bar to the prosecution of the present action, (Naftzger v. Gregg, [Cal.] 33 Pac. Rep. 757; Estate of Blythe, [Cal.] 34 Pac. Rep. 108.) The justice of this rule is apparent, in view of the fact that the judgment pleaded by the respondent, and determined by the court below to constitute a bar to the plaintiff's cause of action, has been reversed in this court. The judgment is reversed.

POWELL v. PATISON et ux. (No. 18,002.) (Supreme Court of California. Nov. 8, 1893.)

MORTGAGE—FORECLOSURE—IMPERFECT RECORD ON APPEAL—REVIEW.

Where, on appeal, the only question is whether an instrument sought to be foreclosed was given as a mortgage, and the question was treated as an issue of fact below, but no finding was made, and the instrument is not brought up by the record, and is only pleaded according to its legal effect, there is nothing by which the appellate court can determine the nature of the instrument, and a decree refusing a foreclosure must be reversed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; William O. Minor, Judge.

Action by Henry Powell against Henry Patison and wife to foreclose an instrument given to secure the payment of money. From a decree denying a foreclosure, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

P. J. Hazen, for appellant. Stonesifer & Minor, for respondents.

FITZGERALD, J. The complaint substantially alleges that on June 22, 1881, the defendants Henry Patison and his wife, Emma J. Patison, executed to plaintiff's assignor their promissory note for $2,000, payable on the 22d day of June, 1885, with interest as therein specified; that at the same time they executed to the defendants Hamilton and Coleman, as trustees, a conveyance of the real property therein described to secure the payment of the principal and interest mentioned in said note according to the terms thereof, and that said deed of trust was intended and given to said trustees as a mortgage for that purpose. The answer admits the execution of the deed of trust, but specifically denies that it was intended and given as a mortgage. Plaintiff had judgment for the full amount of the note, but the court refused to decree a foreclosure, and it is from that part of the judgment that plaintiff appeals.

The only question arising on this appeal is whether the instrument sought to be foreclosed was given and intended as a mortgage. Upon this issue raised by the pleadings, and which is treated and discussed as an issue of fact, the court below made no finding, and, as the instrument itself is not brought up by the record, and is pleaded only by its legal effect, there is nothing before us by which we can determine whether it is an absolute deed of trust or a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage. There is a well-recognized distinction between these instruments. The former is a conveyance of the property to a trustee for the purpose of selling it to pay debts. The effect of such an instrument is to pass the title absolutely to the trustee, and it vests in him unconditionally and indefeasibly for the purposes of the trust. In the latter the property is conveyed to a trustee merely as collateral security for the payment of a debt, upon an express condition of defeasance, and with power to sell and pay the debt in case of default by the trustor. As we are unable to determine from the record to which class the instrument in question belongs, that part of the judgment appealed from must, for this reason, be reversed. So ordered.

HOMESTEAD — MORTGAGE BY HUSBAND — SUBSEQUENT ACQUIREMENT OF TITLE BY HUSBAND — EFFECT — SECURED DEBT — PERSONAL JUDGMENT

1. Under Civil Code, § 1242, providing that a married person's homestead cannot be incumbered except by the joint act of husband and wife, a mortgage by the husband alone is void, and is not validated by the husband's subsequent acquirement of the homestead by a decree of divorce which assigns it to him, since a subsequently acquired title does not relate back so as to give effect to a void instrument.

2. A personal judgment on a note secured by a valid trust deed is erroneous, since the security must first be exhausted. Barbieri v. Ramelli, 23 Pac. Rep. 1086, 84 Cal. 154, followed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; William O. Minor, Judge.

Action by Henry Powell against Henry Patison and wife. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

P. J. Hazen, for appellants. Stonesifer & Minor, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, J. It appears that on the 2d day of October, 1877, the defendant Henry Patison was the owner and resided with his family on the premises in question; that on that day his wife, the defendant Emma J. Patison, declared a homestead thereon, and that they continued to actually occupy the same up to the 29th day of August, 1887, and that the homestead so declared has never been abandoned; that on September 26, 1884, the defendant Henry Patison made his promissory note to plaintiff for $1,000, and to secure the payment thereof he mortgaged to plaintiff the homestead premises; that on the 29th of August, 1887, the defendant Henry Patison obtained a divorce from his wife, the said Emma J. Patison, and the homestead premises were by the judgment assigned to him. It is claimed by appellants that the court erred in decreeing a foreclosure of the mortgage, for the reason that when the mortgage was executed by the husband there was a valid and subsisting homestead on the premises sought to be mortgaged. Section 1242 of the Civil Code provides that "the homestead of a married person cannot be conveyed or incumbered unless the instrument by which it is conveyed or incumbered is executed and acknowledged by both husband and wife." Under these provisions it is clear that the homestead cannot be conveyed or incumbered except by the joint act of the husband and wife. Hence a conveyance or mortgage thereof by the husband alone is inoperative and void, (Gleason v. Spray, 81 Cal. 220, 22 Pac. Rep. 551; Gagliardo v. Dumont, 54 Cal. 496,) and does not become valid by the premises subsequently losing their character as a homestead, if in this case it can be said that by the decree assigning to the husband the homestead premises they, by reason of that fact, lost their character as such; nor does a subsequently-acquired title relate back so as to give effect to a void instrument. It therefore follows that, as the mortgage herein was void in its inception, the defendant is not estopped from denying its validity, as would be the case if the mortgage itself was a valid instrument.

The claim that the court erred in rendering a judgment against the defendants on their promissory note secured by a valid deed of trust, and which was also sought to be foreclosed as a mortgage in this action, (see case No. 18,002, just decided by this court,—34 Pac. Rep. 676,) must be sustained, for the reason that it is well settled on authority in this state that a "personal judgment on a secured debt before the security has been legally exhausted is erroneous." Barbieri v. Ramelli, 84 Cal. 154, 23 Pac. Rep. 1086; Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 487, 26 Pac. Rep. 1074; Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 362, 30 Pac. Rep. 609.

The motion to dismiss on the ground that plaintiff neglected to demand and have judgment entered for more than six months after final submission of the cause was properly denied. The personal judgment against the defendants Patison on their note secured by a valid deed of trust, and that part of the judgment decreeing a foreclosure of the mortgage, is reversed, but the judgment on the $1,000 note attempted to be secured by the mortgage sought to be foreclosed in this action, the same being void and of no effect, is affirmed. So ordered.

CLARK v. COLLIER. (No. 13,565.)

BUILDING CONTRACT — CONSTRUCTION — PARTIAL PAYMENTS — SUBSTANTIAL COMPLETION — DESTRUCTION BY FIRE.

1. A contract to repair an old building and build an addition, the old part to be turned round, stipulated a certain sum for the whole work, to be paid as follows: "Old part placed in position $200; foundation in and frame up, $300; inclosed, and roof on, chimneys up, and the building completed according to agreement and specifications, $300." Held that, the work on the new part not being in condition to entitle the contractor to the third installment, when the building was destroyed by fire, no recovery on such installment could be had for work on the old part, though that was substantially completed, the contract being an entirety.

2. The second coat of paint not having been put on the new part, two doors not having been hung, and no lock or fastening put on the front door or windows, and the house not having been delivered to the owner, it was not substantially completed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. Rearden, Judge.

Action by William P. Clark against R. H. Collier. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Moses G. Cobb and E. K. Taylor, for appellant. Taylor & Haight, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover a balance of $825, alleged to be due and owing from defendant to plaintiff on a written building contract; and also $50 for extra work. The cause was tried by the court. The judgment was in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

By the contract the plaintiff agreed to repair an old house, and to build a new addition thereto, to be attached to it. The old house was to be turned partly round, removed from its old foundation and placed on a new brick foundation, to be laid by plaintiff under both the old house and the new addition. The plans and specifications of the work to be done upon both the old and the new parts, to which the contract referred, are ordinarily minute. The defendant agreed to pay for the whole work $1,325, by installments as follows: "Old part placed in position, $200; foundation in and frame up, $300; inclosed, and roof on, chimneys up, and the building completed according to agreement and specifications, $300. Balance to be paid on completion of work, if not otherwise agreed upon by both parties hereto." As the work progressed the first two installments were paid, but before further payment was made the whole house (old and new parts) was consumed by fire, without apparent fault of either party.

1. It is not contended that the plaintiff is entitled to recover either the third or last installment unless the conditions stated in the agreement upon which the third installment was to be paid had been performed by plaintiff before the fire. But counsel for appellant contend that these conditions refer only to the new building. They say, "The old house was not to be inclosed, nor any roof put on, nor any chimneys put up." Conceding this, it is not perceived that the effect would be as claimed by counsel, even if, as they contend, the old house was substantially completed before the fire; since no reason appears why the payment of installments may not have been conditioned upon work on the new part. But counsel are mistaken in regard to chimneys. A chimney was to be built in the old part. The contract specifies: "Old house to be moved and turned side to Taylor avenue; chimneys to be taken down and new one built, with wood fireplace where shown on plan." Besides, plaintiff testified that he understood "the terms, 'building completed according to agreement and specifications,' to refer to the old house." The contract is an entirety. There is nothing in it by which the price to be paid for any of the work or materials can be distinguished from that to be paid for any other part. The word "building," in the condition upon which the third installment was to be paid, comprehends the new part, as clearly indicated by the condition of the first payment,—“old part placed in position,” not old building placed in position. I think the trial court correctly construed the contract in this respect.

2. It is contended, however, that both parts of the building were substantially completed before the fire; but without conflict the evidence shows that no part of the second coat of paint upon the new part, required by the contract, had been put on; that the workbench of the carpenters and the paint for the second coat were in the new part at the time of the fire; that two of the doors were not hung, no lock nor fastenings on the front door, and no fastenings on the windows; and that the house had not been delivered to defendant. The plaintiff testified, however, that two days before the fire he had told defendant's wife that the old part of the house was finished, and that she might move into it; but this was contradicted by Mrs. Collier. The court found that plaintiff had never finished, completed, nor delivered the house, and that defendant had never accepted it; and I think the evidence sufficient to justify this finding.

3. Upon the count for extra work the court found for the defendant. As to all the items of this count the evidence was substantially conflicting, except as to one door lock, of the value of 50 cents, which, as compared with the sum in contest, may be considered as de minimis. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HIGGINS v. COLE et al. (No. 18,089.)
CITIES OF THE FIFTH CLASS—CHIEF OF FIRE DEPARTMENT—ELECTION AND APPOINTMENT—ORDINANCES.

1. One elected chief of the fire department of a city of the fifth class under an ordinance providing that he shall be elected annually by members of the department, is not entitled to hold the position for the year, an ordinance having in the mean time been passed, to take effect immediately, providing for the appointment of the chief of the fire department by the board of trustees.

2. Under an ordinance providing that the chief of the fire department shall be appointed annually by the board of trustees, to hold office for a year, or until his successor is appointed and qualified, the trustees may remove him and appoint a successor within the year.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by E. R. Higgins against S. H. Cole and others for injunction. From an order dissolving a temporary injunction, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank H. Short, George A. Nourse, C. C. Merriam, and Austin & Drew, for appellant. Reed B. Ferry, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The city of Fresno is a municipal corporation, organized in 1885, under the provisions of an act of the legislature approved March 13, 1883, entitled "An act to provide for the organization, incorporation, and government of municipal corporations." It is of the fifth class named in the act, and has a board of trustees vested with power, among other things, "to provide fire engines and all other necessary or proper apparatus for the prevention and extinguishment of fires;" "to appoint and remove such policemen and other subordinate officers as they may deem proper, and to fix their duties and compensation;" "to establish fire limits, with proper regulations;" and "to do and perform any and all other acts and things necessary to carry out the provisions of this chapter," etc. Section 764, subs. 6, 15, 18, 19. The city now owns, and ever since its incorporation has owned, three fire engines and other apparatus for the prevention and extinguishment of fires, and it also has, and has had, a volunteer fire department. In 1891 there was a city ordinance, No. 224, providing: "Section 1. The fire department of this city shall consist of volunteer companies of firemen, organized into engine, hose and hook and ladder companies, who shall elect their officers. Sec. 2. The chief of the fire department, and his assistants, shall be elected annually by members of the department, with the approval of the board of trustees, and shall give such bond as the board of trustees may require." On the 18th of January, 1892, an ordinance (No. 248) was passed, amending the foregoing ordinance, and reading as follows: "Section 1. The fire department of the city shall consist of volunteer companies of firemen, organized into engine, hose and hook and ladder companies, who shall elect their own officers, to wit: the foreman, who is the presiding officer, a secretary and a treasurer. Sec. 2. The chief of the fire department, and his associates, shall be appointed annually by the board of trustees, to hold office each for one year, or until his or their successors are appointed and qualified. And the chief of the fire department shall give a bond," etc. "Sec. 3.

This ordinance shall take effect and be in force immediately from and after its passage and approval."

In December, 1891, the plaintiff, E. R. Higgins, was elected chief of the fire department by the members thereof, and on the 21st of that month notice of such election was given to the board of trustees. It being suggested that the trustees must make the appointment themselves, in order to make it legal, the matter was continued from time to time until February 1, 1892, when the plaintiff was elected chief by the trustees. Thereafter, on March 7, 1892, the board of trustees passed a resolution declaring the position of chief of the fire department vacant, and then appointed the defendant, Timothy Walton, to fill the vacancy. The trustees also by resolution directed the city marshal to put the said Walton in possession of all the fire apparatus owned by the city. The plaintiff, when notified of this action of the trustees, denied their right to remove him from his position as chief, or to take from his possession and control the fire apparatus of the city; and thereupon, on March 8th, he commenced this action against the trustees, the city marshal, and the said Walton, alleging, among other things, that he was then the chief of the volunteer fire department of the city, and as such was in possession and entitled to the possession of all the fire apparatus of the city; that all the acts of the trustees in declaring his position vacant and electing Walton to fill his place, and in directing the city marshal to take from his possession the fire apparatus and to deliver possession of the same to Walton, were done without right or authority of law; that the marshal and Walton had demanded that plaintiff deliver to them the possession of the said apparatus, and had threatened to take immediate and unlawful possession of the same, and unless restrained would proceed forcibly, unlawfully, and wrongfully to execute their threats; wherefore, he prayed that the court make an order enjoining the defendants, and each of them, from taking forcible or other possession of said fire apparatus, or interfering with the same, or molesting the plaintiff's possession thereof. Upon this complaint the court granted a temporary injunction, but subsequently, on motion of defendants, dissolved it; and from that order the plaintiff appeals.

In support of the appeal it is contended: (1) That the members of the fire department were authorized and empowered to elect a chief of the department, without the approval of the board of trustees; and that the appellant, having been so elected, was clothed with authority to hold possession of, manage and control the fire apparatus of the city; and that the trustees had no right to interfere with or disturb his possession, management, and control thereof. (2) That if the trustees had the right to appoint a chief, their action in removing appellant, after he had been appointed by them and before the expiration of his term of office of one year, was without authority of law, and was null and void. That part of the act of 1883 relating to municipal corporations of the fifth class, and under which Fresno was organized as a corporation, contains no special provisions in regard to a volunteer or paid fire department, and we are cited to no general statute providing that any fire department shall have authority to elect its own chief. Section 3335 of the Political Code provides how fire companies may be formed and organized in incorporated and unincorporated cities, towns, or villages. Section 3336 provides that "every such fire company must choose or elect a foreman, who is the presiding officer, and a secretary and treasurer," etc. And sections 3342 and 3343 prescribe the duties of the chief of the fire department. In none of these provisions, however, is anything found which can be construed as giving the chief a right to the possession or control of the fire apparatus, or prescribing the manner of his election or appointment. This being so, appellant had no rights or authority, as chief of the fire department, except such as he acquired under the ordinances of the city. His first contention cannot, therefore, be sustained.

The solution of the second question presented must depend upon the validity and effect of Ordinance No. 248. Appellant contends that that ordinance was ultra vires and void, but no constitutional provision or statute is cited, and we know of none with which it is in conflict. By the statute under which the city was organized the board of trustees was given power "to pass ordinances not in conflict with the constitution and laws of this state or of the United States," (section 764, subd. 1,) and the ordinance in question must therefore be held valid. The ordinance, in effect, provided that the chief should be appointed to hold office for one year, or until his successor should be appointed and qualified. This, as we understand it, must be construed as declaring only that the term of office shall continue until a successor is elected and qualified, and not necessarily for a full year. And under the statute providing that the trustees may "appoint and remove such policemen and other subordinate officers as they may deem proper," it would seem that it had no power to limit their right of removal. The constitution declares: "When the term of any officer or commissioner is not provided for in this constitution, the term of such officer or commissioner may be declared by law; and, if not so declared, such officer or commissioner shall hold his position as such officer or commissioner during the pleasure of the authority making such appointment." Section 16, art. 20. As the term of office of the chief of the fire department was not fixed by the constitution nor declared by law, it must be held that appellant's term continued only during the pleasure of the appointing power, and that he was rightly removed. In making the order appealed from the court below held that injunction was not in any event the proper remedy to determine the plaintiff's rights; but, in view of the fact that counsel earnestly ask for a decision on the merits, that question may be passed without further notice. We advise that the order be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

WENZEL v. SCHULTZ et al. (No. 18,125.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER — LIEN — MORTGAGE — RIGHT OF MORTGAGOR TO COMPEL FORECLOSURE.

1. S. conveyed land, subject to a mortgage, to plaintiff, by absolute deed, as security for a debt. Plaintiff renewed the mortgage, and afterwards, without having his debt paid, reconveyed it to S., who was to sell it, and pay plaintiff. S. conveyed it to his wife, and she conveyed it to D., who had no notice of any vendor's lien on the land. All the conveyances were subject to the mortgage given by plaintiff. Held, that plaintiff was not entitled to a vendor's lien on such land.

2. D. is not estopped, in such case, from denying that plaintiff ever had title to the land.

3. Though the note secured by the mortgage given by plaintiff is payable on or before a date specified, he cannot compel a foreclosure of the mortgage before the note is due, especially where D. simply bought the land subject to the mortgage, and did not obligate herself to pay it.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Calaveras county; C. V. Gottschalk, Judge.

Action by Frederick Wenzel against Lavantia Schultz, Elizabeth A. Davis, Hattie Stoerling, and Ed. D. Taylor, administrator of the estate of Charles F. Schultz, deceased, to establish and foreclose a vendor's lien on land, and to compel the foreclosure of a mortgage on such land executed by plaintiff to defendant Stoerling. From a judgment of nonsuit, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Eagon & Rust, John W. Armstrong, and Armstrong & Platnauer, for appellant. Daniel Titus, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. According to the averments of the amended and supplementary complaint, plaintiff was on the 8th day of December, 1888, the owner of, and in the possession of, certain land described therein. That plaintiff sold and conveyed the land to Charles F. Schultz. The consideration of the sale was $5,000, as follows: Schultz agreed to pay off a debt of plaintiff to Hattie Stoerling, amounting to $1,500, evidenced by a promissory note bearing interest at 10½ per cent. per annum, and secured by a mortgage on the land conveyed. The residue of the purchase money, amounting to $3,500, was to be paid in gold coin. No part of the purchase price was paid. On the 1st of May, 1889, on an accounting between plaintiff and Schultz, there was found to be due to plaintiff on account of the $3,500, part of the purchase price of the land, the sum of $2,700, for which sum Charles F. Schultz and Lavantia Schultz, his wife, made to plaintiff their promissory note, payable one day after date, with interest at 9 per cent. per annum. On the 28th day of May, 1889, Charles F. Schultz, being at the point of death, and desirous of avoiding the necessity of administration on his estate, conveyed said land to Lavantia Schultz, his wife, subject to the vendor's lien of plaintiff, and subject to the payment to plaintiff of the purchase money, as aforesaid, of all of which she had notice, and then and there agreed to pay said purchase money to plaintiff. Lavantia Schultz is insolvent. The interest of the defendant Elizabeth A. Davis in said land is vested under a deed from the defendant Lavantia Schultz, dated February 6, 1891, and as a part of the consideration thereof the former assumed and agreed to pay the debt of the plaintiff to Hattie Stoerling, secured by said mortgage; and the deed to her recites that the conveyance is subject to the mortgage which is described therein. Charles F. Schultz died on or about June 30, 1889, and defendant Ed. D. Taylor is administrator of his estate. Defendant Davis has not paid off or discharged the Stoerling mortgage upon the land, and the sum secured thereby was not due when the action was commenced; the note being payable "on or before October 1, 1892." The claim of plaintiff, and the alleged vendor's lien, as well as the agreement to pay the mortgage by Schultz, deceased, was presented to the administrator, and by him allowed as against the estate, but without prejudice to the rights of third persons in the land, and his action was approved by the judge. On the 23d day of November, 1891, plaintiff requested the administrator to institute proceedings for the sale of the land to satisfy his claim, which was refused, whereupon this action was brought. Defendant Elizabeth A. Davis answered, denying, among other things, that the plaintiff was ever the owner of the land in question, or that he sold it to Schultz. She admits her purchase thereof, and avers it was for a valuable consideration, and without notice of plaintiff's alleged vendor's lien, and avers the Stoerling note and mortgage are not due and payable. The case was tried by the court without a jury, commencing June 15, 1892, and a judgment of nonsuit was entered, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

The motion for a nonsuit was based upon "the ground that said plaintiff has failed to show that he has a lien on the property described in the complaint, or that he was entitled to any relief against said defendants." The nonsuit seems to have been properly granted. The evidence tended to show that Charles F. Schultz was the owner of the property, and, being indebted to plaintiff, he conveyed the land to the latter by an absolute deed of conveyance, but simply as security for the sum of money due said plaintiff. There was an understanding that plaintiff would sell the land, pay off a mortgage held by defendant Stoerling, which Schultz had created, for $1,400, retain the sum of money due him, and pay to Schultz the residue, if any, received from the sale. Failing to make a sale of the property, by reason of being absent much of the time from the locality, plaintiff reconveyed to Schultz upon an understanding that he (Schultz) would sell the land, pay off the Stoerling mortgage, which plaintiff had renewed in his own name for $1,500, and pay plaintiff the sum due him from the proceeds. Schultz was sick, nigh unto death, and, at the request of plaintiff, conveyed the land in question to his wife by deed of gift, with a like understanding. The latter conveyed to the defendant Elizabeth A. Davis, subject to the Stoerling mortgage, but, so far as appears, without notice of any vendor's lien on the part of plaintiff. Under such circumstances, the deed from Schultz to plaintiff was a mortgage, and conveyed no title to the latter. Civil Code, § 2924; Code Civil Proc. § 744. Upon its face, the deed from Charles F. Schultz to the plaintiff, under date of April 30, 1885, was an absolute conveyance; and while, between the parties, it only amounted to a mortgage, yet it was sufficient to pass the title as between plaintiff and a purchaser from him, had he sold and conveyed the property in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, to an innocent purchaser without notice. He did not do so, however, but reconveyed the property to his mortgagor, relying, apparently, upon the good faith of the parties, who were his friends, to make the sale which he had failed to accomplish, and to pay him from the proceeds what was justly due him.

The doctrine of estoppel, invoked by appellant, has no application, as against defendant Elizabeth A. Davis, so far as the vendor's lien is concerned. She is not, in other words, estopped from saying that plaintiff never had title to the land. Her predecessor in interest, Charles F. Schultz, was not estopped from showing that his deed to plaintiff was in fact a mortgage, and neither is she estopped from making the same claim. Were the rule as contended for by appellant, no absolute deed could ever be shown by parol to be intended as a mortgage. We may add that a grantee in fee, who owes no duty to his grantor, is not estopped from disputing the title of such grantor. As was said in San Francisco v. Lawton, 18 Cal. 476: "A grantee in fee may deny that his grantor had any title. With the execution of the conveyance, the transaction between the parties is closed. Thenceforth, the grantee holds the property for himself, and is neither bound to surrender possession to his grantor, nor to maintain the validity of his title." In Osterhout v. Shoemaker, 3 Hill, 518, it was said: "There is no estoppel where the occupant is under no obligation, express or implied, that he will at some time, or in some event, surrender the possession. The grantee in fee is under no obligation. He does not receive the possession under any contract, express or implied, that he will give it up. He takes the land to hold for himself, and to dispose of it at his pleasure. He owes no faith or allegiance to the grantor, and he does him no wrong when he treats him as an entire stranger to the title." Sparrow v. Kingman, 1 N. Y. 253; Blight's Lessee v. Rochester, 7 Wheat. 548; Society v. Town of Pawlet, 4 Pet. 506; Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. 54; Barker v. Salmon, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 32.

The question as to the character of the deed from Schultz to plaintiff was properly in issue. The answer of defendant Davis denied that plaintiff ever owned the land, and under such a denial it was proper to show that the deed to plaintiff was a mortgage, and hence did not convey the title. Smith v. Smith, 80 Cal. 323, 21 Pac. Rep. 4, and 22 Pac. Rep. 186, 549; Grewell v. Walden, 23 Cal. 165. It is conceded that the defendant Davis took the land subject to the lien of the mortgage executed by the plaintiff to Hattie Stoerling, but the mortgage was not yet due when this action was commenced. The note which it was given to secure was, it is true, payable on or before October 1, 1892. This gave plaintiff an option to pay it prior to that time, but did not give to the payee a right to enforce it until the date mentioned, and the obligation devolving upon defendant Davis is no greater than that of the plaintiff. Indeed, there is nothing in the record showing that the defendant Davis ever obligated herself to pay the note. She bought the land subject to the mortgage, and if she does not discharge it the land becomes liable for its payment, not because of any personal obligation on her part to pay the note, but because it is secured by a lien on such land. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MITCHELL. (No. 21,003.)

CRIMINAL LAW—MISCONDUCT OF JURY—EVIDENCE.

1. On a murder trial, one of defendant's principal witnesses was a woman who kept a disreputable place, and with whom he lived. During the trial, four of the jurors visited her place repeatedly, and their conduct became so notorious that the judge reprimanded them, and placed them in the custody of the sheriff, and his comments were published in the newspapers. The sheriff also told the jury that if a disagreement was brought about by those of their number guilty of the misconduct, "there will be hell to pay." Held, that a conviction would be set aside, since the freedom of action of the jury had been foreclosed by the notoriety attending their misconduct, and the only way they could free themselves from suspicion was by a conviction.

2. On a trial for the murder of a militiaman, the fact that defendant had been ordered out of the way by an officer, not the deceased, when the company was engaged in skirmish drill, several hours before the murder, is not admissible in evidence, since any inference of ill feeling by defendant against deceased on this ground is too strained.

3. Evidence that a third person is guilty of the murder is admissible, though he had been previously acquitted of the offense.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Rube Mitchell was convicted of murder, and appeals. Reversed.

Clay W. Taylor and Johnson & Chase, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

SEARLS, C. The defendant was informed against for the crime of murder, and convicted for killing Oscar Crandall in the county of Tehama on the 24th day of April, 1891. The appeal is from a final judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. On a former trial defendant was convicted of murder, and on appeal to this court a new trial was ordered. People v. Mitchell, 94 Cal. 550, 29 Pac. Rep. 1106. C. A. Boyden and Frank Hughes were charged in the same information with defendant. Boyden had been tried and acquitted, and Hughes had been discharged without a trial.

It appears, also, that one Long had been indicted or informed against by a separate proceeding for the same offense, and upon a trial had been acquitted. Oscar Crandall was a member of a military company, and on the evening of April 23, 1891, which was a bright, moonlight night, had been out with his company drilling. The defendant was on the ground where the drill was carried on. About 11 o'clock P. M., Crandall, with four comrades, repaired to the Arcade saloon, at the corner of Main and Hickory streets, Red Bluff, kept by Henry Rathja, passed into a back room, and engaged in a game of cards. Crandall did not participate in the game, but witnessed it. Some time later, and, according to a preponderance of testimony, after 12 o'clock, the defendant entered the saloon, passed to the back room, remained a brief period, returned to the front room, met C. A. Boyden, who had come in, engaged in conversation with him, and the two went out together. About the same time, according to the testimony of Rathja, Crandall arose, and walked out the back door upon a high porch which overlooked a back yard, with a gate at the side near the steps leading down from the porch opening into Hickory street, and commenced talking in imitation of a Chinaman. While so talking, some one in Hickory street replied to him, whereupon a conversation involving threats and much vulgarity and obscenity was heard. Crandall evidently went down the steps and to the gate, which was open. A pistol shot was heard, and Crandall was found near the gate, insensible, shot through the head, and with a contused wound on the head near where the bullet entered, from which wounds he died a few hours later. The theory of the defendant at the trial was that he was at a saloon until the south-bound Oregon express arrived, due 11:50 P. M.; that he rode back on the bus of the Tremont hotel to the Cone and Kimball's corner, where he jumped off, went to Rathja's saloon, talked with Boyden, who wanted some opium; that they went to his, defendant's, house, 1½ blocks away, and, while in the act of administering a "shot of opium" to himself and Boyden, they heard the shot, and a few moments after Hughes rushed in, and said a man was shot, whereupon the three men ran to the spot, found the body, and carried it around to the front of the saloon. The testimony on the part of the prosecution was mainly circumstantial. One witness, who heard the conversation between Crandall and his supposed slayer, identified one of the voices as that of defendant. Numerous witnesses testified to the fact that at the time the supposed fatal shot was fired defendant was in his house on High street. Upon the whole case as made by the testimony, it may be said the result very properly depended upon the degree of credit which properly attached to the statements of many of the witnesses. Under such circumstances, the office of the jury was one calling for the exercise of careful discrimination and sound judgment.

The trial of the cause commenced October 14, 1892. Mary Howard, a woman who lived with the defendant on High street, in Red Bluff, and who was an important witness on his behalf, and who, it is apparent, kept a disreputable place, files an affidavit, and is supported by other and reputable witnesses, showing that four of the jurors at 10 o'clock at night visited her place, drank intoxicating liquor, and that two of the jurors talked with her about the case; that the four jurors were at her house on another night during the trial, and that one of them visited her a number of times during the trial, and while the testimony was being taken. This conduct became so notorious that on the 28th day of October the judge of the court took occasion to deliver to the jury a somewhat lengthy and most sensible admonition, in which he dwelt upon the duty of jurors to refrain from intercourse and association with parties and witnesses intimately connected with the case, and closed his remarks by stating that, unless his suggestions were literally followed, the jury would be placed in the custody of the sheriff. The admonition of the court was published at length in the Daily Sentinel, a newspaper published in Red Bluff, under the heading of "What Does it Mean?" Subsequently, and while some of the jurors were discussing the conduct of the jurors in visiting the Howard place on High street, the sheriff of the county, who was an important witness on behalf of the prosecution, approached them, and declared to them: "If those fellows who were down on High street hang this jury, there will be hell to pay, and you'll all be in it." The sheriff and one other witness admit the language charged to have been used by him to the jurors, except that they deny that he said "you'll all be in it." The jurors implicated file affidavits, admitting the visits to Mary Howard as charged, say they only took one small glass of beer each, and those shown to have been there at other times, and to have conversed with the Howard woman, deny that it had any effect on their verdict. On Monday, October 31st, the jury was ordered into the custody of the sheriff, and remained in his charge until November 3, 1892, when a verdict was rendered. While thus in custody of an officer, John Tait, one of the jurors, on, to wit, the evening of November 2d, separated from his fellows, and went to the town of Tehama, 12 miles distant, where he remained over night with his family, returning the next morning. In justice to him it must be stated that his wife was dangerously ill, and his conduct was doubtless prompted by natural affection, and no suspicion attaches to him. That he should have applied to the court for leave to thus separate from his fellow jurors is true beyond cavil. The purity of the motive, however, takes away the sting of the offense. Another juror separated from the jury while in custody of the officer, and visited the postoffice to post a letter. It incidentally appears that the residence of Mary Howard was the resort of lewd women and profligate men. A number of these women were witnesses in the case. That four of the jurors should have visited this place indicates a lack of that high appreciation of the duties and responsibilities of jurors, essential to the purity of the jury system, is quite apparent. That one, at least, if not two of them, should have repeatedly visited such a place under such circumstances, and there conversed in reference to the case on trial, a case which involved the life and liberty of a man whose home was there, the place around which clustered many of the prominent actors and acts in the case, furnishes indubitable proof either of a willingness to do wrong, or, what is more probable, an entire lack of any adequate conception of the position which as jurors they occupied.

It may appear at first blush that the friend and witness of defendant, having been largely instrumental in bringing about the condition of which he complains, it cannot be presumed that he was injured thereby, and that to yield to his plaint will result in encouraging other men charged with crime to resort to like practices. This is but a surface view of the case, and when we go deeper we find that the jurors in question had compromised themselves; that their position had been exposed; that the public was watching them with a suspicious eye; and that henceforth they could only allay that suspicion, and vindicate themselves from it, by convicting the defendant. Their freedom of action was foreclosed. Amid all the notoriety given to their conduct, there can be no reasonable doubt but that the jurors understood fully the unfortunate position in which they were placed, and the temptation to escape by the most practicable mode, viz. by convicting the defendant, was too strong a one to be reasonably resisted by such men under such circumstances. It is plain that all this tended to the injury of the defendant, and a verdict rendered under such circumstances should not be upheld. It is unfortunate for the jury system and for the cause of justice that such episodes should occur in the trial of causes, but the evil will be soonest suppressed by wiping out verdicts rendered under such circumstances.

The other errors assigned need not be noticed at length. The evidence in relation to defendant having been ordered out of the way when the military company was engaged in skirmish drill seems to us as too remote. The order was by an officer of the company, and not by deceased, and any inference of ill feeling by defendant to the deceased by reason thereof would seem strained. It is not regarded as of sufficient importance to call for a reversal, but it is recommended that upon another trial the evidence be excluded.

The testimony tending to show that one Long was the guilty party was admissible. It is always proper to show that some other person, and not the defendant, committed the crime with which he is charged, and the fact that Long had been tried and acquitted did not alter the case. The argument of respondent that if defendant could try to prove Long's guilt the people could show the judgment of acquittal is not sound, for the simple reason that a judgment as between the people and Long is not evidence in a case of People v. Mitchell.

The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PORTER v. FISHER. (No. 18,108.)

FACTORS AND BROKERS—COMMISSIONS—STATUTE OF FRAUDS—DIVISIBLE CONTRACT.

1. Though, under Civil Code, § 1624, a parol contract employing a broker to sell land is invalid, a broker employed to sell or exchange land, and the personality thereon, under an agreement for a commission of 5 per cent. on the price, may, on bringing about an exchange, recover 5 per cent. on a separate valuation placed on the personality by the principal, though in the exchange, as between the parties thereto, there may have been no division of the consideration, as the contract, in such case, is divisible, and that part as to the land is not unlawful, but merely incapable of enforcement.

2. It is immaterial whether the separate valuation was placed on the personal property by the principal before or after the exchange, or to whom he made the statement as to the valuation, since it is an admission that the personal property was exchanged at such valuation, so that its price can be separated from the gross sum involved in the exchange.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by G. L. Porter against S. C. Fisher. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Goucher, Jacobs & Jones, (Oregon Sanders, of counsel,) for appellant. Nourse & Short, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Porter, as assignee of one Abbott, brought suit against appellant on several causes of action, among which was one for the sum of $2,500, as commissions claimed to have been earned by Abbott in effecting a transfer of property between appellant, Fisher, and one J. A. Baxter. The property Fisher conveyed and transferred to Baxter consisted of 280 acres of land in Tulare county, together with stock and personal property of a large amount; and the property conveyed and transferred by Baxter to Fisher was 107 acres of land at Byron, Contra Costa county, together with all the personal property thereon. Abbott claimed that he was employed by Fisher as a broker to sell or exchange his said property, real and personal, and for which he was to receive a commission of 5 per cent. His employment, however, as such broker, was not in writing. The cause was tried before the court and a jury, and plaintiff, as assignee of Abbott, recovered on account of the said commissions the sum of $1,000. The gross recovery by the plaintiff was for a larger sum, but no controversy is made here, except as to the recovery of said $1,000. The appeal is from the judgment and order denying a new trial. Respondent concedes that no recovery can be had for commissions upon the sale or exchange of the real estate, but contends that the contract for commissions is divisible; that the price of Fisher's real estate was estimated in the exchange at $30,000, and the price of the personal property at $20,000; and that he is entitled to recover commissions upon the price of the personal property at the agreed percentage, notwithstanding his contract, so far as the real estate is concerned, was void. The complaint alleges that the commissions were earned by Abbott as agent and broker for the defendant "in the sale, exchange, and transfer of certain real and personal property to one J. A. Baxter, which said real and personal property was sold, exchanged, and transferred to said Baxter for the agreed price and consideration of $50,000, being $30,000 for real property so exchanged and transferred, and $20,000 for the personal property so exchanged and transferred; that the defendant agreed to pay to G. Frank Abbott, for his services as his agent and broker in selling and disposing of said property, five per cent. commission on the price thereof, to wit, $2,500." As between Fisher and Baxter, the parties to the trade, there appears to have been no separation of prices between the real and personal property of the defendant alleged in the complaint. It is also evident from the statements of the complaint that the undertaking of Abbott was to sell or exchange the real and personal property of Fisher. Appellant contends that the contract was entire, and is not divisible; that as the agreement to pay commissions upon the real estate was void,—not being in writing,—there can be no recovery of any part or portion of the commissions.

As between Baxter and Fisher, the parties to the exchange, the testimony does not show such division of the consideration as to clearly make the contract apportionable, as between them. The question, however, arises between one of the parties to the exchange, and the broker or agent who made the exchange; and we see no reason why a recovery should not be had for commissions upon the sale of the personal property, if the amount or price thereof can be ascertained with reasonable certainty. The contract set out in the complaint alleges the broker's compensation to be a percentage of the price of the property sold or exchanged; that is, 5 per cent.,—5 cents on each dollar of such price. If, therefore, the price of the personal property can be separated from the price of the real estate, the illegality attaching to the contract, so far as the real estate is concerned, does not, we think, necessarily attach to the remainder of the consideration. Section 1624 of the Civil Code merely declares that a contract or agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for a compensation or a commission is "invalid" unless the same, or some note or memorandum thereof, be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his agent. It is not a contract which is malum in se, nor is it malum prohibitum. It is merely an invalid contract, or one incapable of enforcement.

In the case of Jackson v. Shawl, 29 Cal. 272, a pawnbroker charged upon a loan, secured by a pledge, interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per month. A statute then in force provided, in effect, that a pawnbroker shall not charge a greater rate of interest on loans exceeding $20 than 4 per cent. a month in advance. The plaintiff tendered the $500 loaned, and interest at the rate of 4 per cent. The court said: "Here the contract between the parties was legal as to the principal sum, but illegal as to the interest. The two things were not inseparable,"—and, quoting from authorities, further said: "When the transaction is of such a nature that the good part of the consideration can be separated from that which is bad, the courts will make the distinction, for the common law doth divide according to common reason, and, having made that void that is against law, lets the rest stand. The general and more liberal principle now is that when any matter, void even by statute, be mixed up with good matter, which is entirely independent of it, the good part shall stand, and the rest be void." In Treadwell v. Davis, 34 Cal. 601, it was held, (syllabus:) "Where a contract consists of two distinct parts, which are readily severable, and not in any material sense dependent on each other,—one part being valid, and the other void,—the rule is to enforce that part of the contract which is valid." See, also, Granger v. Mining Co., 59 Cal. 678. In More v. Bonnet, 40 Cal. 254, it was said: "No precise rule can be laid down for the solution of the question whether a contract is entire or separable, but it must be solved by considering both the language and the subject-matter of the contract." The cases above cited go further than is required in this case, because the contracts there considered were, as to some part, at least, unlawful; but it is not unlawful for a broker or agent to act upon a verbal authority or request, in making a purchase or sale of real estate for another. He may lawfully do so, and incurs no penalty for the doing of it. He simply relies upon the willingness of his principal for the payment of his commissions, and cannot compel payment. Section 1599 of the Civil Code provides: "Where a contract has several distinct objects, of which one at least is lawful and one at least is unlawful, in whole or in part, the contract is void as to the latter and valid as to the rest."

Appellant, in his brief, in referring to the testimony of Mr. Abbott, says that he testified that: "Mr. Fisher placed a value upon the real estate and personal property separately. He placed a value on the stallion at $8,000; on the rest of the personal property, $12,000; making $20,000 for the personal property, and $30,000 for the real property,"—but insists that it does not appear when Mr. Fisher placed this value upon the real and personal property separately, whether it was before or after the trade, nor whether he made the statement to Abbott, or to some one else, nor that the witness contracted with reference to any such estimate, or with reference to the personal property separately. We think it makes no difference when the defendant placed the separate values on the real and personal property, nor to whom he stated such values. It was an admission upon his part that the personal property was exchanged at the price or value of $20,000, and that, therefore, the price of the personal property was capable of separation from the gross sum involved in the exchange. Mr. Baxter, a witness for plaintiff, testified: "I gave Mr. Fisher a deed for my 107 acres of land at Byron, Contra Costa county, together with all the personal property on my place, in return for which Mr. Fisher gave me a deed of his 280 acres of land in Tulare county, together with stock and personal property, which personal property he estimated to be worth about $20,000. The full valuation of land and personal property I took on a basis of $50,000, which was the valuation set upon it by Mr. Fisher." This testimony corroborates that of Mr. Abbott,—that the price of the personal property was capable of being ascertained, and was estimated in the exchange; and while the defendant claimed upon the trial that the value of both properties was very much less than the price put upon them at the time of the exchange, it was competent for the jury to determine whether such price of the personal property was ascertainable from the evidence, and to fix the price thereof. If the contract had been for a commission upon what Fisher received for his property, a different question would have been presented, and the actual value of the Baxter property would have been involved. But even in that case the separate estimates placed by Fisher upon his real and personal property would have been competent to show the proportion of the entire value of the Baxter property, which was given in exchange for defendant's personal property. The jury must have found the contract to have been as alleged in the complaint, and the estimate of value placed upon his personal property by the defendant could properly be taken as the price referred to in the contract for commissions.

Other questions are made in the record upon exceptions to evidence, and to the instructions given to the jury, the more important of which relate to the question above considered, and our conclusion thereon is conclusive of these exceptions. We think the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed, and so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

WILLIAMS et al. v. MOUNTAINEER
GOLD MIN. CO. et al. (No. 18,123.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—MINING CLAIMS—LIEN ON STRUCTURES—TITLE.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 1183, providing that mechanics, material men, etc., performing labor or furnishing material in the construction of any building or other structure, shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials, and that any person who performs labor on any mining claim has a lien upon the same, a lien for material furnished for structures on a mining claim, to be used in operating the same, filed against the structures, is invalid, as it must be filed against the whole claim.

2. A person who has furnished material for a reduction mill on a mining claim, and filed a claim of lien, which is invalid because against the mill instead of the whole claim, cannot contend that his lien attached when the mill was commenced, and before it was used in connection with the mine, and therefore before it became appurtenant to the mine, as the mill is a part of the mine, and not a mere appurtenance.

3. Conceding the mill to be appurtenant to the mine, such contention cannot be sustained, for the further reason that one who has furnished material for a structure must be held to have anticipated its future use.

4. A person who has furnished material for a structure on a mining claim for a corporation which he found in possession of the mine, claiming it all, cannot enforce a lien filed against the structure instead of the whole claim, and therefore invalid, on the ground that, when he furnished the materials, the corporation had not yet acquired title to that portion of the claim on which the structure was erected, as title cannot be tried in such an action.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sierra county; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Consolidated actions by T. Williams, John Hayes, and others against the Mountaineer Gold Mining Company and others to enforce liens. From a judgment against Hayes, and from an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank R. Wehe, for appellant. F. D. Soward, Tiley L. Ford, and Haven & Haven, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. The general nature of this case is well stated in the first finding of facts, which is as follows: "The defendant the Mountaineer Gold Mining Company, a corporation, at all the times referred to in the pleadings in the cause, was the owner and in the possession of and working a certain mine known as the Berger or Mountaineer quartz mine, situate in said Sierra county, and consisting of some seven contiguous mining locations, four of which are quartz mining locations, and three placer mining locations, with their respective appurtenances. The plaintiff T. Williams and twenty-four others commenced a joint action July 28, 1891, to foreclose certain miners' liens respectively, which had heretofore been filed against said property for labor performed thereon at various periods, dating from the 9th of October, 1890, to the 11th of July, 1891. T. Berger was also a party plaintiff to this action, but the suit as to him was subsequently dismissed. Prior to the commencement of last-named action, to wit, on April 28, 1891, John Hayes had brought an action against said defendant corporation to foreclose a mechanic's lien filed against the 'Mountaineer Reduction Works, Tramway and Flume,' situate on the 'Lake Placer Claim,' one of the locations above referred to. The Hayes lien was filed for record February 2, 1891, and was for lumber and materials furnished by said Hayes between July 20 and December 31, 1890, to be used in the construction of the said reduction works, etc. The action of T. Williams et als. and that of Hayes were by order of court consolidated August 24, 1891. On September 26, 1891, Stephen Tippet and four others brought suit against defendant corporation similar to the Williams suit, and to foreclose liens against the same property. Three of these liens were for labor performed on said property from May 25 to July 11, 1891, and one of them for materials claimed to have been furnished between January 1 and July 11, 1891, to be used on said mining property. This last action was by order of the court made October 5, 1891, consolidated with the two actions previously consolidated as aforesaid. The reduction works or quartz mill on and connected with said mining property were completed January 4, 1891. Robt. Forbes is made a party to the action, as one claiming ownership to a certain rock breaker and amalgamating pan attached to said mill by means of bolts, etc. William Johns is made a party to the action as one claiming ownership to certain mining machinery attached to said quartz mill. The Johns claim is based on a chattel mortgage, covering said mining machinery, duly executed on behalf of the then owners of said Mountaineer quartz mine on the 15th day of October, 1890. The property claimed to be covered by the mortgage is described therein as 'certain machinery' for quartz milling, consisting of ten battery stems, ten tappets, ten sockets, ten cams, one cam shaft, two mortars, two challenge feeders, one Knight water wheel, shafting and pulleys belonging to wheel, all to be put into and made a part of the mill of the mortgagors at the Mountaineer mine, in Butte township, Sierra county, California. H. Scammon is made a party to the suit as one claiming an interest in all the property in suit, by reason of an attachment levied thereon as the property of defendant corporation, which attachment was duly levied on the 11th day of July, 1891." Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiffs and sustaining the lien of Johns, but against the claim of the appellant, who appeals from the judgment and an order refusing him a new trial.

It will be seen that there are some 30 claimants of liens upon the mine for labor performed, mostly in the tunnel, but also in a variety of other employments about the mine, and that the work was done at different periods. Appellant commenced to furnish materials for the construction of the mill, tramway, boarding house, and other buildings July 21, 1890, and filed his claim of lien on February 2, 1891. Two of the plaintiffs commenced work before he filed his claim of lien, but all the others commenced work after his claim of lien was filed, and many after he had commenced his action to foreclose his lien. The plaintiffs in the third action on behalf of lien claimants commenced their work after the plaintiffs in the second suit had filed their notice of lien. It is obvious at once that this state of things could not exist in a case for the foreclosure of liens for labor and material used in the construction of a building under contract.

The most important question in the case arises from the fact that appellant only claims a lien upon the reduction works, and filed his notice and claim of lien accordingly, while the plaintiffs in the two suits seek to establish liens upon the whole mining claim, including the reduction works, and described it all in their notice and claim of lien. They contend that the mill, tramway, boarding house, and other structures described in appellant's notice and claim of lien constitute a part only of the property for the improvement of which Hayes furnished lumber, and that he cannot have a lien upon a part only of the structures or property constructed, altered, or improved. The trial court sustained this view. Section 1183, Code Civil Proc., so far as material here, is as follows: "Mechanics, material men, contractors, subcontractors, artisans, architects, machinists, builders, miners, and all persons and laborers of every class, performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in the construction, alteration, or repair, either in whole or in part, of any building, wharf, bridge, ditch, flume, aqueduct, tunnel, fence, machinery railroad, wagonroad, or other structure, shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials, for the value of such labor done and materials furnished; * * * and any person who performs labor in any mining claim or claims has a lien upon the same, and the works owned and used by the owners for reducing the ores from such mining claim or claims, for the work or labor done, or materials furnished," etc. The use of the phrase "other structure" in the above extract shows that the word "structure" comprehends all the properties specifically enumerated, and is broad enough to include any similar things constructed, should the enumeration prove incomplete. Following this with the language "and any person who," it would seem to show that a mining claim was not included in the structures upon which liens were allowed; and the procedure provided for acquiring liens upon structures are not in all respects applicable to those claiming liens upon mining claims. They cannot all date back to the commencement of the work. On a mine the work is always going on; may have commenced before the laborers were born; and may continue indefinitely. There is no special 30 days, therefore, within which lienors must record their notices and claim of lien. The labor cannot generally be said to have contributed to the creation of the property, or added to its value. On the contrary, it may diminish its value,—perhaps render it valueless. The Code does not seem to have provided for all the cases which may arise in regard to liens upon mining claims. We can only follow the procedure so far as applicable. For that purpose the mining claim must stand in the place of the structure as the property to be charged with the lien. It is the property which should be described in the notice and claim of lien under section 1187. There can be no harm in so speaking of it if we do not lose sight of essential differences, when it is necessary to discriminate.

Appellant contends that he furnished materials for the structures he has described in his notice of lien, and under section 1183 he is entitled to a lien upon the property for which he has furnished materials. He therefore insists that, although a lien might have been had upon the whole mine,—which, however, he does not concede,—he is entitled to charge the very structures he has contributed to make for the value of his materials. The same sort of argument might have been made for those who worked in the tunnel had they sought to acquire a lien upon the tunnel only, and those who worked on the ditch and flume had they sought a lien upon those structures only. In such case had each of the supposed liens been foreclosed, and the structures sold to different purchasers, and the mine to another, each purchaser might have found himself the owner of property utterly valueless without the other parts. They were all parts of one entire property, and we cannot suppose, unless the language of the statute compels such conclusion, that such a result was contemplated. One who has a built a chimney in a house, or a porch, or a doorstep, has helped to build a structure, to wit, a chimney, a porch, or doorstep; but he cannot acquire a lien upon these specific structures, and by detached sales destroy the value of the claims depending upon liens upon the whole house. A structure may be a part of another larger structure, and in reference to it constitute but a part of a structure. In such cases it is well settled the lien must cover the entire structure. It was so held in Cox v. Railroad Co., 44 Cal. 28. See, also, Trust Co. v. Candler, 87 Ga. 241, 13 S. E. Rep. 560, in which the following language is quoted with approbation: "A railroad, with its depots, bridges, and other appurtenances, is no less an entirety than a dwelling house with its kitchen, its chimneys, and its doorsteps; and yet, no one has ever supposed that a mechanic's lien could be enforced against the doorsteps or chimneys of a dwelling house, or that they could be sold and removed, to the utter destruction of the whole property." In that case it was also said: "A verdict and judgment attempting to set up and enforce a lien upon a specified portion of a railroad are void upon their face." See, also, Railway Co. v. Wilcox, 122 Ind. 84, 23 N. E. Rep. 506. In the case at bar the tramway extends to the mouth of the tunnel. To sell it, with a convenient space around it, would be to deprive the owners of the tunnel, and yet not give the tunnel to the purchaser. What would be a convenient space around a structure which can never be of use as a structure? All these structures, severed from the mine, would be valueless as structures. The question has, I think, been decided by this court. In Dickenson v. Bolger, 55 Cal. 285, work had been done upon a dwelling house situate upon a mining claim, and also upon a tunnel and other portions of the mining claim. Objection was made that the claim of lien filed did not designate the amount and value of the work done on the dwelling house, and the amount and value of the work done on the tunnel, as required by section 1188, Code Civil Proc. The court said: "It [the section] plainly applies only to cases in which one claim is filed against two or more separate and distinct buildings, mining claims, or other improvements owned by the same person, and not to a case where, as here, all the work was performed upon one and the same piece of property, although upon different portions of it." In Helm v. Chapman, 66 Cal. 291, 5 Pac. Rep. 352, it was said a mine or pit may be called a "structure;" and "section 1183 does not, it is true, provide for a lien upon mines, but upon 'mining claims.' The lien, if it exists at all, extends to the whole claim. Strictly speaking, of course, a mining claim cannot be constructed, altered, or repaired. The intention of the lawmakers seems to have been to give a lien upon the whole claim for labor performed on and for materials furnished for and used in any structure or on or in the mining claim." In Silvester v. Mine Co., 80 Cal. 510, 22 Pac. Rep. 217, a contractor had been employed "to erect hydraulic power hoisting-works and pumping-works building, gallows frame, and track, lay down a water pipe to supply water to the mine, and to pump out the mine to the third level." It was contended that the statute did not give the contractor a lien on the mining claim, but only on the structure he had contracted to construct, alter, and repair, and that his notice and claim of lien, being against the mine, and not against the specific structures, were invalid. It is said: "The lien given by the statute is upon the mining claim as a whole, and not upon the separate pieces of work done in its repair. Code Civil Proc. § 1183. The mine is a 'structure' within the meaning of the statute. Helm v. Chapman, 66 Cal. 291, 5 Pac. Rep. 352. The work done in this case became and was a part of the mining claim, and the whole claim, including the added improvements, was subject to the lien. Civil Code, § 661. Therefore the notice of lien, as against the mining claim, was valid." This is a distinct ruling to the effect that a claim of lien for materials furnished, to be used in a building upon a mining claim, should be against the mining claim, and not against the specific structure upon the mine.

Appellant further contends that his lien attached before the mill was used in connection with the mine, and before, therefore, it became an appurtenance, under section 1183, Code Civil Proc., or section 661, Civil Code. As his lien attached at the time the mill was commenced, it, of course, antedates its use. But I think in this case the mill is not a mere appurtenance for the mine. It is upon the mining claim, and, like the tunnels, tramways, and roads, is a part of the mine. But, conceding it to be an appurtenance, I think this reading of the Code too literal. This is to stick in the bark. One contributing labor or materials to a structure must be held to have anticipated its future use. It is necessary to do this in many cases in order to determine what the structure is upon which he is entitled to a lien. A drain to a house may be an appurtenance before either is used. I think the statute would cover a thing as an incident which was exclusively adapted to the use of the principal before actually used.

It is further objected that the title to that portion of the mining claim upon which the mill was located was not acquired until after his lien attached. Appellant found the corporate defendant in possession of the premises, claiming it all as its mining claim, and furnished materials to improve its claim. In this action he cannot dispute its title. Title cannot be tried in this form of action. If these views are correct, appellant has no lien and is not interested in the other points made. I advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

WEST v. CONANT. (No. 18,111.)

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—REDEMPTION—RIGHTS OF MORTGAGOR—RECEIVER.

Although, under the statute, the purchaser of mortgaged premises on foreclosure sale is entitled to rents of the premises or the value of the use and occupation from the time of the sale until redemption, a receiver will not be appointed for the premises before the expiration of the period allowed for redemption, even though the judgment debtor is insolvent, as the latter, until then, is entitled to the possession.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; John C. Gray, Judge.

Action by one West against one Conant for the appointment of a receiver. The action was dismissed, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John Gall, for appellant. H. V. Reardan, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The complaint shows that the plaintiff, to whom the defendant had given a note and mortgage, purchased the property therein described at foreclosure sale on March 12, 1892, for the sum of $21,414.30, being the full amount of the judgment, costs, and expenses, and received the sheriff's certificate; that the premises had never been redeemed from the sale, and the time allowed by law for the redemption thereof would not expire until several months after the commencement of the action; that the mortgaged premises were of less value than the amount due plaintiff, and afforded an insufficient security for the payment thereof; that ever since the sale the defendant has been in possession of the land, has collected and received all the rents, issues, and profits thereof, and refused to pay over to the plaintiff any portion of the same; that there were large crops of wheat, barley, and hay growing on the premises, which the defendant threatened to harvest and sell, and convert the proceeds thereof to his own use, to the loss of plaintiff in the sum of $4,000; that defendant is insolvent, and has no property subject to execution out of which the value of the rents and profits of the premises, or the value of the use and occupation thereof during the time allowed for the redemption, could be made; and that unless a receiver be appointed to protect the rights and interests of the plaintiff, he will be wholly deprived of the rents and profits and the value of the use and occupation. Upon the filing of this complaint an order was made appointing a receiver as prayed for. Thereafter, on motion of the defendant, said order was revoked, the receiver discharged, the demurrer sustained, and the plaintiff's action dismissed.

We think that the judgment should be affirmed. Under our statutes the judgment debtor is entitled to remain in possession of the land until the expiration of the time allowed for redemption. During that period the court may restrain the commission of waste on the property on the application of the purchaser; but we know of no provision of the Codes, of any decision, or of any principle, upon which the purchaser is entitled to place a receiver in charge of the property during the period of redemption. The defendant had six months within which to determine whether or not he would redeem the property, and was entitled to use the property and take the proceeds thereof. It is true the statute provides that the purchaser, from the time of the sale until redemption, is entitled to receive from the tenant in possession the rents of the property sold, or the value of the use and occupation thereof; but this is no warrant for the appointment of a receiver to oust the judgment debtor from his possession, and take from him the crops which have been produced through his labor, and that is what was sought in this action. The plaintiff was no more entitled to have a receiver put in charge of the defendant's property than he would have been if he had brought an ordinary action of assumpsit; and this is true, even if it be conceded that plaintiff was entitled to sue for "the rents of the property sold, or the value of the use and occupation thereof," before the expiration of the period allowed for the redemption. White v. Griggs, 54 Iowa, 650, 7 N. W. Rep. 125.

In determining the question involved in this appeal, we have again to say that we have received no assistance from the respondent. No brief has been filed, no suggestion made in any form. The vice of such a practice, and the injustice to the court, is especially noticeable in this case, where we have to go outside of the theory discussed by appellant, and upon which it is asserted the court below proceeded, in order to affirm the judgment. Judgment affirmed.

STEWART v. HALL et al. (No. 18,146.)

WILLS—PROBATE AND CONTEST.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 1312, requiring a copy of the opposition to probate of a will to be served on petitioner and others interested in the estate, where a written opposition to the probate of a will is filed at the time set for hearing a petition by the executor for probate, and shows personal service thereof on him, it is error to strike it from the files, on his motion, on the ground that there is no proof of service on the other persons interested, and to refuse to hear proof of such service, on the ground that it comes too late.

2. Such an order will not be affirmed on the ground that afterwards, on motion of contestant, the court vacated the order, and gave her time to serve the opposition, where it refused to set aside an order admitting the will to probate and granting letters to the executor.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; W. F. Masten, Judge.

Petition by W. P. Hall to probate the will of William Stewart, deceased. Mary E. Stewart filed an opposition, which was stricken from the files, and an order was made admitting the will to probate, and issuing letters to petitioner. From these orders, and from an order refusing to set aside the order admitting the will to probate, contestant appeals. Reversed.

Spencer & Raker, Clay W. Taylor, J. Chadbourne, and C. McClaskey, for appellant. Goodwin & Dodge, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. William Stewart died in Lassen county on May 13, 1892, leaving what purported to be his last will, in which the respondent W. P. Hall was named as executor, and in which the daughters of the deceased, May M. Atteberry, aged 24 years, and Nellie Stewart, aged 11 months, both residents of said Lassen county, and his daughter Lena M. Stewart, aged 20 years, resident of Butte county, were made devisees of all his property. Hall filed a petition for the probate of the will, and the hearing of the petition was fixed for the 11th day of June, 1892, at 10 o'clock A. M. At the appointed time the appellant, Mary E. Stewart, who is the widow of the deceased, filed her written opposition to the probate of said will, with a written indorsement thereon of admission of service thereof by the attorneys of record of said petitioner Hall, and also the indorsement of what purported to be the signature of said devisee Mrs. Atteberry, admitting service of said contest; but there was no other proof of such service. Counsel for petitioner Hall, in the absence of counsel for contestant, moved orally—no notice thereof having been given—to strike the said written opposition of Mary E. Stewart from the files, on the ground that the same had not been filed or served as required by law. This motion was taken under advisement until 2 o'clock P. M. of said day. In the mean time the contestant furnished proof that the written opposition had been personally served on said Hall and on said Mrs. Atteberry; and proof was also made that said infant devisee, Nellie Stewart, was in the care and custody of her mother, said Mary E. Stewart, and that a copy of said opposition had been served on said Mary, and also on said infant, Nellie; and contestant also had filed a petition for the appointment of a guardian ad litem of said infant Nellie, to take charge of her interests in said litigation. The court, however, refused to consider said proofs, upon the ground that they "came too late, and should have been filed at 10 o'clock A. M. of said day." The court then, on motion of petitioner, struck said opposition from the files, and proceeded to hear the petition for the probate of the will, entirely disregarding said opposition, and made an order admitting said will to probate, and appointing said Hall executor, to all of which rulings contestant objected and excepted. From said order the contestant, Mary E. Stewart, appeals.

The written opposition of contestant was in proper form, and set forth many alleged facts which, if true, established the invalidity of the asserted will; and the court erred in denying said opposition, and proceeding to probate the will, and to issue letters testamentary to Hall, without any hearing of the matters alleged in said opposition. This course, it seems, was based upon the provision of section 1312, Code Civil Proc., that the contestant must file a written opposition, "and serve a copy on the petitioner and other residents of the county interested in the estate." But it had been served on the attorneys of Hall; and, this being so, the court should not have refused to give the appellant an opportunity to prove the averments of her written opposition, although there was not at 10 o'clock A. M. sufficient proof of service on the other persons mentioned in said section of the Code. As against Hall, at least, there was a full showing by the pleading on file that the will was invalid, and that he had no rights in the premises. The court should have ordered that contestant furnish proper proof of service on the other parties, and that the latter should have proper time in which to demur or answer the opposition, as provided by the Code. However, on the return day, and before the hour to which the matter had been continued, the contestant did furnish proper proof of service upon all the persons mentioned in the Code, except, perhaps, the infant, Nellie, and, as to said infant, had furnished proof of all the service that could possibly have been made upon her, and had asked for the appointment of a guardian ad litem. Under these circumstances, we see no ground upon which the order appealed from can be affirmed. It is true that afterwards, on July 5th, the court on motion of appellant, made an order vacating the order striking out said opposition, and giving contestant certain time to serve the same; but that order is no answer to this appeal, for the court refused to set aside the order admitting the will to probate, and granting letters to Hall. Appellant had a right to be heard before the will was probated and Hall appointed executor. "Contesting a will after probate," under sections 1327-1333, is a different thing.

Appellant also appeals from the order of June 11th, striking out her written opposition, and from the order of July 5th, refusing to set aside the order admitting the will to probate. Respondent does not raise the question that these orders are not appealable, and the question would not be important here. The orders appealed from are reversed, with directions to the court below to hear and determine the original question whether or not the said will should be admitted to probate, and letters testamentary issued to said Hall, upon the issues made by said written opposition, after proper service thereof and such pleadings as respondents may choose to make thereto.

BOYNE v. RYAN, District Attorney. (No. 14,760.)

MANDAMUS—WHEN LIES — TO CONTROL DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

1. Section 8 of the county government act, (Laws 1891, p. 296,) authorizing the district attorney of any county, and making it his duty, to institute suit for money paid out by the board of supervisors without authority of law, vests the attorney with a discretion in determining whether to bring suit which a court cannot control by mandamus.

2. Mandamus will not lie to compel the district attorney to institute a suit to recover money unlawfully paid out by the board of supervisors, as the court could not compel him to prosecute it, and it will not undertake by mandamus what cannot be accomplished.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Petition by William Boyne against F. D. Ryan, district attorney, for a writ of mandamus. From a judgment for respondent, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Johnson, Johnson & Johnson, for appellant. H. L. Buckley and A. J. & Elwood Bruner, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by petitioner from a judgment for respondent in a proceeding to obtain a writ of mandate. The petition avers that petitioner is a citizen, taxpayer, and resident of Sacramento county; that respondent is district attorney of said county; that McClatchy & Co., proprietors of the Bee newspaper, presented a claim of $1,567 to the board of supervisors of said county for advertising the delinquent list, which the board considered and allowed for the sum of $1,317, and the same was paid to said McClatchy & Co.; and that the same was allowed and ordered paid by said board without authority of law. It is averred that the allowance was without authority of law, because the said claim was not properly itemized; because it was not properly verified; because there was no contract made with McClatchy & Co. for the advertising, after a publication inviting bids therefor; and because the amount allowed was too large. It is then averred that the respondent knew of these facts; that he was requested by petitioner and other taxpayers to institute a suit against McClatchy & Co. to recover said money paid to them as aforesaid; and that he refuses to do so. The prayer is that respondent be commanded by mandate to institute such suit. The court below sustained a general demurrer to the petition, and, petitioner declining to amend, judgment went for respondent.

We think that the judgment of the superior court was right. The proceeding is founded on section 8 of the county government act, (Laws 1891, p. 296,) which, so far as material here, is as follows: "Hereafter, when any board of supervisors shall without authority of law order any money paid as a salary, fees, or any other purposes, and such money shall have been actually paid, * * * the district attorney of such county is hereby empowered, and it is hereby made his duty, to institute suit, in the name of the county, against such person or persons, to recover the money so paid, and twenty per cent. damages for the use thereof." As the expense of the publication of the delinquent list is a charge against the county, and as the board of supervisors are given the power to examine, settle, and allow accounts chargeable against the county, it is perhaps questionable if the averments of the petition show that the allowance of the claim of McClatchy & Co. was "without authority of law," within the meaning of said section 8. But, waiving that point, we think that the district attorney, in determining whether or not, in any particular instance, he should bring an action under said section, is vested with a discretion which a court cannot control by mandamus. Of course, if in a clear case he should willfully, corruptly, or inexcusably refuse to perform his duty in the premises, he could be proceeded against for malfeasance or nonfeasance in office. There are also other remedies for the protection of the public treasury; as, for instance, the supervisors are personally liable for the allowance of illegal claims. Moreover, a court will not do a vain or fruitless thing, or undertake by mandamus what cannot be accomplished. As was said by Chancellor Kent (Trustees, etc., v. Nicoll, 3 Johns. 598:) "It has hitherto been considered as a settled principle that a court will not undertake to exercise power but when they exercise it to some purpose." Now, it is not contended that the language of section 8 goes any further than to declare it to be the duty of the district attorney "to institute suit." But to compel a district attorney, against his will and contrary to his judgment, to merely commence an action, would be an idle thing, in the absence of power to compel him to prosecute it to final determination; and such power is not contended for by appellant, and, indeed, there could be no practicable exercise of such power. The court granting the writ of mandate could not follow the district attorney through the case, and see to it that he filed proper pleadings, offered sufficient evidence, made necessary objections to evidence offered by the defendant, used proper arguments and authorities in discussing questions raised before the court or jury, and conducted the trial with reasonable care and diligence. The judgment is affirmed.

IRWIN v. McDOWELL. (No. 19,149.)

CHATTEL MORTGAGES—DISCHARGE—PLEDGE—PLEADING—AMENDMENT AT TRIAL.

1. In an action by a mortgagee for conversion of the mortgaged chattels, there is no abuse of discretion in allowing defendant, at the trial, to amend his answer, and to aver that the mortgage was released before defendant took the property.

2. An instrument termed a "bill of sale," executed by C., authorizing I. to take and sell the articles therein specified till C.'s debt to I. is satisfied, when the residue shall be returned to C., and reciting that it is given as security for the debt, is a contract for a pledge, within Civil Code, § 2987, providing that every contract by which the possession of personal property is transferred as security, only, is a pledge.

3. Though such instrument, by reciting that it is given in lieu of a certain chattel mortgage, shows an intention that it shall take the place of the chattel mortgage, it does not, in the absence of the delivery of the articles thereby agreed to be pledged, release the chattel mortgage; Civil Code, § 2988, providing that no pledge is valid till the property is delivered to the pledgee.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Action by I. Isaac Irwin against S. A. McDowell for conversion of chattels mortgaged to plaintiff. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

M. S. Babcock, for appellant. Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. The defendant had judgment in the above-entitled cause, from which, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. The case was here on a former appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for a nominal sum, from which he appealed, whereupon the judgment was reversed, and a new trial ordered. 91 Cal. 119, 27 Pac. Rep. 601. The general history of the case is there stated, and will not be repeated here.

At the last trial, the defendant, (respondent here,) for the purpose of showing that the property upon which he levied as sheriff had been discharged from the lien of plaintiff's chattel mortgage before such levy, introduced in evidence a bill of sale of certain other personal property from Robert L. Coutts to plaintiff, executed and acknowledged by said plaintiff and said Coutts under date of August 11, 1890. There was no abuse of discretion on the part of the court below in permitting the defendant, at the trial, to amend his answer so as to aver "that the mortgage on the hay and grain levied on in said action of Coutts v. Coutts, and hereinafter mentioned, was released before the said levy was made."

The "bill of sale," as it is termed, purported to be a conveyance by Robert L. Coutts to plaintiff of certain horses, cows, wagons, harness, etc., on condition that plaintiff was to take immediate possession of the property, and to sell them, or any of them, during 30 days, at a price to be approved by Coutts,—the money to be received by plaintiff, and applied upon his demand against Coutts,—and, at the end of 30 days, plaintiff was at liberty to sell, at his pleasure, until his demand was satisfied, whereupon the residue of the property was to be returned to Coutts. It then proceeds as follows: "This sale is made, and the property placed in the possession of said Irwin, as additional security for a certain debt secured by crop mortgage, and for goods had, and merchandise had and received, by said Coutts from said Irwin." Two or three days after the foregoing bill of sale was executed, Cave J. Coutts, a brother of Robert L. Coutts, with the latter, met plaintiff, and desired him to make some alterations in the bill of sale, to which he at first objected, but finally consented, whereupon, they all repaired to the attorney of plaintiff, who, at the request and by the consent of the parties, added to the bill of sale, immediately following the clause quoted above, as follows: "And a certain real-estate mortgage executed on November the 23, 1889, is held as additional security to the property held under this bill of sale, which is given, in lieu of the chattel mortgage, as security for the note held thereunder." The parties thereupon acknowledged the execution of the instrument before the attorney, who was a notary public, or, as some of the witnesses thought, it was acknowledged when signed. This, however, is not important, as the instrument related to personal property,—not requiring to be acknowledged. The instrument, as first executed, clearly indicated its object to be to give other and further security for the debt due and owing from Robert L. Coutts to plaintiff, in addition to the chattel mortgage. As amended, it just as clearly indicates an intention that it shall take the place of the chattel mortgage. It refers to a certain other mortgage which plaintiff held upon the interest of Coutts in a ranch, as being held as additional security to the property held under this bill of sale, "which is given in lieu of the chattel mortgage." "In lieu" signifies instead of, in place of. We must conclude, from the language used, that it was the intention of the parties that the instrument, which, upon its face, shows that it was intended simply as security to plaintiff for the debt due him, was intended to take the place of the chattel mortgage. But it by no means follows that the result claimed by appellant ensued, viz. that the chattel mortgage was, upon the signing of the bill of sale, discharged at once. The language used in the instrument indicates that in consideration of the pledge—for that is what it amounts to—of certain horses, cows, wagons, etc., plaintiff was willing to forego and discharge the lien of his chattel mortgage. That was the consideration for what, in effect, was an agreement on his part to forego the claim of his mortgage. But the new security was never delivered to him, and, although he sought diligently for two or three days to obtain possession of the personal property named in the instrument, and which it was the duty of Robert L. Coutts to deliver, he never obtained it; and, at the end of the two or three days, Cave J. Coutts brought an action against the latter, and attached all of the property,—the hay and grain covered by the chattel mortgage, because it had been released, and the horses, etc., named in the bill of sale, because they had not been delivered to plaintiff. Was it released? "Every contract by which the possession of personal property is transferred as security only, is to be deemed a pledge." Civil Code, § 2987. "The lien of the pledge is dependent on possession, and no pledge is valid until the property pledged is delivered to the pledgee, or to a pledge-holder, as hereafter prescribed." Id. § 2988. A glance at the instrument which we have called a "bill of sale" will show that within the purview of section 2987, supra, it was simply a contract for a pledge, and that, until the property pledged was delivered to plaintiff, the contract was executory. The pledge was the consideration for the release of the chattel mortgage, and, until it was perfected by such delivery, it did not operate to release the mortgage, in fact. No duty to execute a release of the chattel mortgage devolved upon plaintiff until he received the consideration for his agreement so to do. Had he, upon demand, refused to give a release, it could not have been enforced, except upon showing that he had received the consideration upon which his agreement was predicated. The mortgage remained of record, and was notice to the sheriff who levied the attachment, and who, a few days later, upon learning of the existence of the mortgage, released such attachment. Berson v. Nunan, 63 Cal. 550. We must not be understood as holding that a mortgage may not be satisfied in fact without a discharge of record, but only that in this case, as the consideration was never received by plaintiff, it was not in fact waived or discharged, and, as it still remained of record, and notice to all the world, even the defendant here, who was sheriff, was not misled by any act of the plaintiff. We are of opinion that the court below erred in holding that the chattel mortgage was released prior to the levy of the attachment, for which error the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial is ordered.

PEOPLE v. BANNISTER et al. (No. 21,014.) (Supreme Court of California. Nov. 10, 1893.)

CRIMINAL LAW—VERDICT—DEGREE OF GUILT.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 1157, providing that whenever a crime is distinguished into degrees, the jury, if they convict, must find the degree of which defendant is guilty, the jury are not excused from finding the degree though the indictment was for burglary, of which there are but two degrees, and the court instructed that if the jury found defendants guilty they could find them guilty of no higher offense than burglary in the second degree.

2. Where the verdict fails to find the degree of the crime of which defendant is guilty, he is not entitled to a discharge, but merely to a new trial.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. R. Dangerfield, Judge.

Arthur Bannister and Frank Hawley were convicted of burglary, and appeal. Reversed.

W. I. Brobeck and P. A. Bergerot, for appellants. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

SEARLS, C. Defendants were informed against and convicted of burglary. The crime consisted of entering a freight car of the Southern Pacific Company with intent to commit larceny. Defendant Bannister was sentenced to one year's imprisonment in the state prison at San Quentin, and defendant Hawley to three years at the state reform school for juvenile offenders at Whittier. The appeal is from the judgment, and the cause comes up on the judgment roll, there being no bill of exceptions. By their verdict the jury found the defendants "guilty as charged," and recommended them to the mercy of the court. The crime of burglary is by the Penal Code divided into two degrees. Burglary committed in the nighttime is burglary of the first degree. Burglary committed in the daytime is burglary of the second degree. The judgments recite that the court, by its instructions before verdict, advised the jury that if they found the defendants guilty, they could not find them guilty of any higher offense than burglary in the second degree. The jury did not, however, by their verdict, specify the degree of burglary of which they found the defendants guilty. This was error. Section 1157 of the Penal Code provides that "whenever a crime is distinguished into degrees, the jury if they convict the defendant must find the degree of the crime of which he is guilty." The reason for a specification of the degree of the crime becomes apparent when we bear in mind that the severity of the punishment depends upon it. This court has so often declared such a verdict to be erroneous that further comment is unnecessary. People v. Lee Yune Chong, 94 Cal. 379, 29 Pac. Rep. 776; People v. Ah Gow, 53 Cal. 628; People v. Jefferson, 52 Cal. 452; People v. Travers, 73 Cal. 580, 15 Pac. Rep. 293; People v. O'Neil, 78 Cal. 388, 20 Pac. Rep. 705; People v. Campbell, 40 Cal. 129; People v. Marquis, 15 Cal. 38.

The defendants were not entitled to be discharged upon the rendition of the faulty verdict, but are entitled to another trial. People v. Travers, supra; People v. Lee Yune Chong, supra.

It is stated in respondent's brief that one Thomas Cornwell was informed against in the same information, and that by mistake his name is omitted from the copy of the information in the printed transcript. We do not find in the minutes of the trial any allusion to him, except that he moved to set aside the verdict. There is no judgment in his case, and he is not included in the notice of appeal. We are not called upon to reverse a judgment, of the very existence of which we have no information, upon an appeal which, so far as we know, has never been taken. If Thomas Cornwell was informed against, tried, found guilty, and sentenced to punishment, it may well be he has elected to satisfy the judgment in preference to taking the chances of another trial, and possibly enhanced punishment, even if error intervened, which we do not presume. His case, if any he has, is not involved in this appeal.

The judgments appealed from in cases of Arthur Bannister and Frank Hawley should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA MOTOR ROAD CO. v. SAN BERNARDINO NAT.

BANK et al. (No. 19,139.)

JUDGE—DISQUALIFICATION—EVIDENCE.

1. The fact that the judge has a suit pending against the plaintiff, a corporation, in an action on trial before him, is insufficient to disqualify him on account of interest, where the two actions are entirely independent, and the judgment in the one case will in no way affect the judgment in the other.

2. The failure to deny or answer the statement in the affidavit for change of venue, to the effect that affiant is informed and believes that the judge has said he considered himself disqualified to try any case in which plaintiff is a party, will not be taken as an admission of disqualification, where such judge denies the motion for the change.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by the Southern California Motor Road Company against the San Bernardino National Bank and others to cancel a certain promissory note executed by plaintiff to defendant bank, and to enjoin the sale of certain first mortgage bonds given to secure the payment of such note. From an order denying its motion for a change of venue, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. E. Houghton, for appellant. Curtis, Oster & Curtis, W. A. Purington, and F. A. Berlin, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This action was commenced in the superior court of San Bernardino county, and in due time the plaintiff moved that the place of trial be changed to another county, upon the ground that both of the judges of the court in which it was pending were disqualified to try it. The motion was heard before Hon. John L. Campbell, one of the judges of the said court, and denied, and from that order the plaintiff appeals.

It does not appear from the transcript what the character of the action is, but it is said in the brief for respondents that it was "brought by appellant against respondents to obtain a judgment that a certain informally executed promissory note, given by appellant to respondent the San Bernardino National Bank is not the promissory note of appellant, and seeking, as incidental relief, to have said bank enjoined from a threatened sale of certain first mortgage bonds of appellant, pledged to secure the payment of said promissory note." The affidavit on which the motion was based was made by R. W. Button, the president of the corporation plaintiff; and, as to Judge Campbell, it stated, in substance, that he, as plaintiff, had brought an action in the superior court of San Bernardino county against the said corporation and I. H. Polk, as receiver thereof, to recover possession of certain land occupied by the corporation's railroad, and $5,000 damages for the alleged unlawful occupation thereof; that the action was still pending and undetermined in the said court, and the effect of the judgment, "if John L. Campbell should recover it in said case, will be to prevent said Southern California Motor Road Company and said I. H. Polk, as such receiver, from operating its road from the town of Colton to the city of San Bernardino; that by reason of the existence of said suit and claim of John L. Campbell against said Southern California Motor Road Company and I. H. Polk, as such receiver, I am informed and believe that said John L. Campbell has stated that he considers himself disqualified from trying any case in which the said Southern California Motor Road Company and I. H. Polk, as its receiver, are parties." At the hearing of the motion, counsel for plaintiff read the affidavit, and the complaint referred to therein, and also the notice of the motion and demand for a change of the place of trial. No witnesses were sworn or examined, and no other affidavit or testimony was offered, read, or heard. The motion was then argued by counsel, and denied, and the plaintiff excepted to the ruling. It is admitted that Judge Otis, the other judge of the said court, was disqualified from acting in the case, and it is claimed for appellant that it appears from the affidavit read that Judge Campbell was also disqualified. Whether this claim should be sustained, or not, is the only question presented for decision.

The provisions of the Code bearing on the question are as follows: "No justice, judge or justice of the peace shall sit or act as such in any action or proceeding: (1) To which he is a party, or in which he is interested. (2) When he is related to either party by consanguinity or affinity within the third degree computed according to the rules of law. (3) When he has been attorney or counsel for either party in the action or proceeding." Section 170, Code Civil Proc. "The court may on motion change the place of trial in the following cases: * * * (4) When from any cause the judge is disqualified from acting." Section 397, Code Civil Proc. "If an action or proceeding is commenced or pending in a court, and the judge or justice thereof is disqualified from acting as such, * * * it must be transferred for trial to a court," etc. Section 398, Code Civil Proc. It is not claimed that Judge Campbell is a party to this action, or that he is related to any party thereto, or that he has been attorney or counsel for either party to the action; but it is urged that, by reason of his suit, he "is interested in this suit, as upon the judgment entered in this case depends his realizing anything in his suit." And it is said: "A judgment one way would make any judgment he might obtain, of value to him; the other way would make judgment of very little value, if not entirely valueless." We fail to see any connection between the two cases. On the contrary, so far as we can discover from the record, they are entirely independent, and the judgment in the one case would in no way be affected by the judgment in the other. This being so, the contention of appellant, in this regard, cannot, in our opinion, be sustained.

It is further urged that, as the statement in the affidavit to the effect that the affiant was informed and believed that Judge Campbell had said he considered himself disqualified from trying any case in which the appellants were parties was not answered or denied, it amounted to, and should be treated as, an admission that he was not qualified to try this particular case, and hence his order should be reversed. In support of this position, counsel say: "Judge Campbell knew better than any one else whether or not he was so interested in this case, by reason of the litigation he was prosecuting against the plaintiff in this case, as to consider himself disqualified from trying this case. As was said by the supreme court of Nevada in the case of Table Mountain Gold & Silver Min. Co. v. Waller's Defeat Silver Min. Co., 4 Nev. 222: 'The knowledge of the judge would be more certain and satisfactory than any evidence. As a general thing, a judge must know, better than any other party, whether he is or not interested in the result of a suit before him.'" The rule of law as thus stated is undoubtedly correct, but we draw from it a different conclusion from that drawn by the learned counsel. The law presumes "that official duty has been regularly performed," (section 1963, subd. 15, Code Civil Proc.,) and, as Judge Campbell knew whether or not he was interested in the result of the case, it must be presumed, from his action in denying the motion, that he was not so interested. In the Nevada case cited, which was in all material respects like this, it was said "that in all motions before a judge, during the progress of a trial, he may act on his own knowledge in regard to things which, in their nature, are better known to himself than they could be to others." We advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

HAIGHT v. TRYON. (No. 14,974.)

NEW TRIAL—NOTICE OF MOTION—PLEADING—CROSS COMPLAINT—APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. A notice of motion for a new trial, directed against the "findings" rather than against the "decision" of the court, is sufficient, as under Code Civil Proc. §§ 632, 633, the findings constitute the decision.

2. In an action for partnership accounting defendant filed a "cross complaint" which related to the partnership transaction set forth in the complaint, alleged the partnership contract in somewhat different terms, and contained only matters in avoidance, or constituting a defense or counterclaim. Held, the averments of the cross complaint were not admitted by failure of plaintiff to answer, as the cross complaint was really an answer to the complaint, and therefore its averments were deemed controverted under Code Civil Proc. § 462.

3. The evidence was insufficient to justify findings in accordance with the averments of the cross complaint where the evidence on the part of plaintiff was positive that there was no such contract between the parties as that alleged in the cross complaint, and defendant merely testified that the cross complaint was true.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Del Norte county; James E. Murphy, Judge.

Action by Daniel Haight against Dennis Tryon for partnership accounting. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

R. W. Miller, for appellant. L. F. Cooper and Sawyer & Burnett, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action for an accounting between partners. The material facts set out in the complaint may be briefly stated as follows: On or about the 1st day of March, 1885, the plaintiff and defendant, at the county of Del Norte, in this state, entered into a verbal contract whereby they agreed to go into the business of buying, slaughtering, and selling beef cattle and mutton sheep, and to divide the profits of the business equally between them. In pursuance of this contract they commenced the said business, and carried it on until February, 1888, when they discontinued it. Plaintiff put into the business a certain amount of money and a certain number of cattle and sheep and certain merchandise, and the defendant put in a certain amount of money and a certain number of cattle and sheep. From the sales the plaintiff received a certain sum of money, and the defendant a larger sum. During the continuance of the business the animals were all disposed of except four head of cattle, of the value of $100, which defendant converted to his own use. No accounting has ever been had, and there is left in the hands of defendant the sum of $3,799.84, and $100 for the said cattle appropriated by him to his own use, one-half of which sums is due and owing to the plaintiff; wherefore plaintiff prays for an accounting and judgment. The defendant answered the complaint, denying that he entered into the contract set out therein, and averring that on or about the 20th day of February, 1885, at the county of Curry, state of Oregon, plaintiff and defendant entered into a verbal contract whereby they agreed to furnish Charles Tryon and Ben Adams money, cattle, and sheep that they might enter into the business of buying, pasturing, selling and slaughtering beef cattle and sheep; that the profits and losses were to be shared equally between plaintiff and defendant after defendant Tryon should receive from plaintiff Haight $1,000 per year for the use of his ranch in Curry county, Or. Then follow denials of most of the other allegations of the complaint, and an averment that defendant put into the business the sum of $7,000. The answer prayed for an accounting, and that defendant have judgment against the plaintiff for the amount found due. At the time of filing the answer the defendant also filed a separate paper, denominated a "cross-complaint," in which he set forth that on or about the 20th day of February, 1885, at the county of Curry, state of Oregon, plaintiff and defendant entered into a verbal contract whereby they agreed to furnish Charles Tryon and Ben Adams money, cattle, and sheep for them to enter into the business of buying, slaughtering, and selling cattle and sheep; that the cattle and sheep were to be kept on Lone ranch, a large farm in said county of Curry, then and up to November, 1888, owned by defendant, and out of the said business defendant was to receive first $1,000 per year for the use of the ranch or farm, and, after said sum was paid to him, then plaintiff and defendant were to share between them the profits and losses of such furnishing; that the said business was carried on by Charles Tryon and Ben Adams up to about the month of August, 1885, when plaintiff and defendant, finding they were losing money, took it away from them, and continued and carried it on on their own account and in their own names until November 5, 1888; that the ranch was so used from February 20, 1885, to November 5, 1888, and defendant received no rent therefor; that, in addition to the use of the ranch, defendant advanced money, cattle, and sheep to carry on the business, amounting with the rent of the ranch to $7,000; that the plaintiff did not advance to carry on the business in money, cattle, and sheep over $1,057.55, and that there is due from plaintiff to defendant, under their agreement, the sum of $5,942.45; that the business was conducted at a loss, and was discontinued on November 5, 1888, and that no accounting has ever been had; that three head of cattle remain undisposed of, one in possession of plaintiff and two in possession of defendant. The defendant then prays for an accounting of all the transactions between the parties; that he have judgment against the plaintiff for $5,942.45; that any property remaining be sold, and the proceeds paid into court; and for general relief. The plaintiff demurred to the cross complaint upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the demurrer was overruled. No answer to the cross complaint was filed. Upon the issues thus framed the case was tried, and the court found that there was due from the plaintiff to the defendant the sum of $2,500; for which sum judgment was entered in favor of the defendant. From this judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

The notice of motion for a new trial stated that the motion would be made upon the grounds, among others, "that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings," and "that the findings are contrary to the evidence." It is claimed by the respondent that such a notice should be directed against the "decision" of the court, and not against the findings, and hence that the notice was insufficient, and the motion was therefore properly denied. This claim is clearly untenable. Under our statute the findings constitute the decision, (sections 632, 633, Code Civil Proc.; Sawyer v. Sargent, 65 Cal. 259, 3 Pac. Rep. 872,) and it has been held that such a notice as that given here complies with the requirements of the Code and is sufficient. Tunnel Co. v. McKenzie, 67 Cal. 485, 8 Pac. Rep. 22.

It is further claimed that the cross complaint was a proper pleading in the case, and, no answer to it having been filed, that its averments were admitted, and no evidence in support of them was necessary; and hence that the findings cannot be assailed for want of evidence to justify them. And upon this theory the court below seems to have based its decision, the principal averments and findings, except as to the amount due, being in almost identically the same language. This claim is also, in our opinion, untenable. The so-called "cross complaint" was not in fact, as we think, a cross complaint, or anything more than an answer. It related to the transaction set forth in the plaintiff's complaint, the partnership between the parties, though alleging in some respects different terms, and contained only matters in "avoidance or constituting a defense or counterclaim," and was deemed to be controverted by the opposite party. Section 462, Code Civil Proc. And the fact that it was called a "cross complaint" did not make it one. It is immaterial what the defendant called his pleading. Whether he designated it an "answer" or "cross complaint," its character will be determined by the court from the facts set up. Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 307; Meeker v. Dalton, 75 Cal. 156, 16 Pac. Rep. 764; Mills v. Fletcher, (Cal.) 34 Pac. Rep. 637.

The only question remaining, which need be considered, is, did the evidence justify the findings? We do not think it did. The evidence was oral and documentary and was quite voluminous. To state it briefly would require considerable space, and subserve no useful purpose. On the part of the plaintiff it was positive that there was no such contract between the parties as that alleged by the defendant, so far as it related to Charles Tryon and Ben Adams, and to the rent of defendant's Oregon farm, and we are unable to find anything on the other side which can be said to raise a substantial conflict upon these issues. The brief statement by defendant, as a witness, that the cross complaint was true did not, in our opinion, have that effect. It follows that the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

CLYNE v. BENICIA WATER CO. (No. 18,109.)

WATER RIGHTS—WHEN APPURTENANT TO LAND—ENFORCEMENT.

1. Defendant water company made a contract with the owner of land on a stream, whereby the latter conveyed to it the right to take water from the stream, and to maintain a main water pipe through her land; in consideration of which, defendant agreed to put a one-inch tap in said main pipe, wherefrom the landowner could draw, free of cost, the water needed for irrigation and domestic purposes. Defendant supplied such water as would flow through the tap mentioned, but laid no pipe through the land. Some years later, the land was sold under a mortgage placed thereon prior to the above agreement, and conveyed to plaintiff. Held, that the right to such water as would flow through the inch tap was appurtenant to the land, and passed to plaintiff.

2. Since the agreement between defendant company and the landowner gave the former the right to appropriate any or all waters of the stream, it was necessary for defendant to restore any water so taken from the stream, before being able to contend, as a defense to an action for specific performance of the contract to supply water, that, by the foreclosure and sale thereunder, it had lost all the riparian rights acquired under the agreement, and that, hence, the consideration therefor had failed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Solano county; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by James Clyne against the Benicia Water Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified.

James D. Thornton and George A. Lamont, for appellant. R. E. Houghton and John Lynch, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Action to enforce specific performance of an agreement. The judgment was for plaintiff, and this appeal is upon the judgment roll. The findings show that July 5, 1883, Eliza D. Nichols was the owner of a tract of land in Solano county, bordering a natural water course known as "Paddy Ranch Creek." She and her grantors had for 10 years used the water of said creek for domestic purposes, and for irrigating about four acres of land, part of said tract. That July 5, 1883, said Nichols executed a mortgage, whereby she mortgaged said land to one Boynton to secure a loan to her of $7,000 and interest, which mortgage was on that day duly recorded. That defendant, being a water company, desired to construct a reservoir on Paddy creek, above the lands of Nichols, and with that view, November 5, 1883, entered into an agreement with said Nichols as follows: "This agreement, made this 5th day of November, 1883, between Eliza D. Nichols, of the county of Solano, state of California, party of the first part, and the Benicia Water Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the state of California, party of the second part, witnesseth, that the said party of the first part, in consideration of the covenants on the part of the said party of the second part hereinafter contained, hereby grants to the said party of the second part the right to lay and maintain a main water pipe through the land now owned and occupied by said first party, and the said first party hereby waives all right to the flow of water in Paddy Ranch creek. And the said party of the second part, in consideration of the covenants of the said party of the first part, hereinbefore mentioned, agrees to and with said party of the first part: (1) To put a one-inch tap in said main pipe at such point on the premises as said party of the first part may direct, from which tap said first party may draw, free of cost, all the water required by her for domestic purposes, and for the irrigation of her vegetable garden, containing about four acres of land. (2) To pay said party a fair and reasonable compensation for any damages that may be done to the vines and fruit trees of said first party in laying and maintaining said main water pipe; the amount of damages, if any, to be determined by arbitration. (3) That said water pipe shall be laid at a depth of two and a half feet below the surface of the ground on said premises. In witness whereof, the said parties have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written. Signed in duplicate. [Seal.] Eliza

D. Nichols. [Seal.] The Benicia Water Company. By Andrew Goodyear, President." The agreement was not recorded. The defendant, in accordance with the terms of the agreement, proceeded to supply the Nichols ranch with water, furnishing the full amount that would flow through an inch tap, but laid no pipe on the Nichols ranch. March 19, 1889, Boynton commenced an action to foreclose his mortgage, but defendant was not made a party to such suit. A judgment and decree was duly entered, foreclosing the mortgage, and the property sold in pursuance of it April 29, 1889, and, no redemption having been made, a deed was executed accordingly, and the grantee went into possession. The foreclosure was in all respects regular, and conveyed the title of Eliza D. Nichols to the grantee. Defendant continued to supply water in accordance with the contract until March 29, 1890, when it closed the tap for that ranch, and refused to turn it on again, denying the plaintiff's right. Plaintiff owns the Nichols ranch through the foreclosure proceedings, and has no other title.

The answer denies certain allegations of the complaint, and sets up certain facts, from which appellant argues that there was a total failure of consideration for the defendant's undertaking. No rescission is averred or found. Defendant's position, at the trial, seems to have been that the right of Eliza D. Nichols under the contract did not pass to plaintiff as an appurtenance. It is not averred or found that defendant furnished water through a pipe on, or conducted to, the Nichols ranch. The agreement was to put a one-inch tap in its mains, from which Eliza D. Nichols could draw all the water required for certain purposes on the Nichols ranch. It is found that defendant did, "in accordance with the terms of said contract, and up to the time the tap was closed, supply and furnish from its main pipe, and through said tap, all the water necessary and required," and that the amount so furnished and necessary was all that would flow through the one-inch tap placed on the main pipe by defendant. The water was used on the Nichols ranch for more than five years. We must presume that such an amount of water was conducted to the ranch in some kind of a channel or pipe. Which ever it was, it would constitute an appurtenance to the Nichols ranch, and the right to it, including the flow of water from the main, passed under the conveyance to plaintiff. Farmer v. Water Co., 56 Cal. 14.

Appellant argues that in consequence of the foreclosure of the mortgage, and the sale thereunder, defendant lost whatever riparian rights it acquired from Nichols; that it was a failure of consideration, through the fault of the plaintiff and his grantors. This may be so and, if so, would have entitled the defendant to rescind; but it did not offer to rescind, and restore to plaintiff everything of value which it acquired under the contract. Counsel says it has nothing which it received under the contract, because plaintiff owns all riparian rights which belonged to the Nichols ranch as completely as Nichols did before the contract was entered into. But this idea of restoration will not do. By the contract, defendant had the right to appropriate all the waters of Paddy Ranch creek, and deprive the Nichols ranch of the flow which it was entitled to as riparian lands. Whether defendant has, as a fact, appropriated such waters, does not appear, and it was not necessary that it should be made to appear, because rescission was not pleaded. If the defendant has taken the water from the creek under the contract, it must restore it, as a condition of rescission. The mere fact that plaintiff can sue for it is not enough. If that were the rule, restoration need never be required, for mere rescission will always give that right. It must deliver the goods, except in some peculiar cases where it is excused.

Counsel says, further, that to compel specific performance, under the circumstances, would be inequitable. By bringing the suit, plaintiff affirms the contract made by Nichols. Still, if defendant had made such issue at the trial, I have no doubt the trial court would have required a conveyance of the riparian right as a condition of the relief granted. Had plaintiff refused to confirm the transfer of riparian rights, I think relief should have been refused. I see no harm to any one in requiring it now, and recommend that the judgment be modified to that effect. I think, however, appellant is not entitled to costs on this appeal.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

'PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment in said cause is modified so as to require plaintiff to convey to defendant his right to the water of the Paddy Ranch creek, belonging to him as owner of the Nichols ranch, and said judgment is in all other respects affirmed. It is further ordered that respondent recover his costs on this appeal.

LILLIS et al. v. PEOPLE'S DITCH CO.
(No. 13,807.)

RES ADJUDICATA—QUESTIONS DETERMINED—DIVERSION OF WATER.

Suit was brought to restrain a ditch company from diverting water from a slough. Defendant alleged that it had acquired a prescriptive right to divert, by means of a ditch of given dimensions, a certain number of feet per second. The court found merely that defendant had acquired the right to divert sufficient water to fill such a ditch without specifying the number of feet which might thus be diverted, or the capacity of the ditch. Held, that this was not an adjudication, under Code Civil Proc. § 1911, as to the number of feet which might be diverted, since the same did not appear on the face of the judgment, or as necessarily included therein, but only as to the right to divert a certain indeterminate amount, and defendant, therefore, in a subsequent action, could prove its right to take an amount greater than it had alleged a right to in the former action. Lillis v. Ditch Co., 30 Pac. Rep. 1108, 95 Cal. 553, followed.

PER CURIAM. The questions presented upon this appeal are substantially the same as those presented in Lillis v. Ditch Co., 95 Cal. 553, 30 Pac. Rep. 1108, and upon the authority of that case the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

EL DORADO COUNTY v. MEISS. (No. 18,107.)

LICENSE TAX—SHEEP RAISING—POWER OF COUNTY—CREATING COUNTY OFFICERS—ACTION FOR TAX.

1. An ordinance passed by county supervisors, imposing a license tax on persons engaged in sheep raising in the county, is authorized by County Government Act, § 25, subd. 27, conferring on the supervisors power "to license, for purposes of regulation and revenue," all legal business carried on in a county, which provision is not in conflict with, but authorized by, Const. art. 11, § 12, prohibiting the legislature from imposing taxes on counties for county purposes, but permitting it by general law to vest in the corporate authorities thereof the power to assess and collect taxes for such purposes.

2. Such constitutional provision allows the imposition by county authorities of a general license tax applicable to one doing business in the county, though not a resident thereof, as well as to the residents thereof.

3. Under Const. art. 11, § 5, declaring that the legislature, by general and uniform laws, shall provide for the election or appointment in the counties of supervisors, sheriffs, clerks, and such other county and municipal officers as public convenience may require, and shall prescribe their duties and fix their terms of office, a county cannot create the office of license tax collector, and make appointments therefor.

4. A county can maintain an action for a license tax, though the provision of the ordinance of its supervisors imposing the license tax, which creates the office of license tax collector, and appointing a person to fill it, is void; since, the amount of the tax being fixed and declared by the ordinance to be a debt due the county, to be collected by action in the name of the county, its general power to sue is not affected by the provision that the action shall be by direction of the license tax collector.

5. Under the provision of a county ordinance imposing a license tax on persons engaged in "raising, grazing, herding, or pasturing" sheep, one herding and pasturing his sheep in one county, except that he drives them to his farm, in the county imposing the license tax, to be sheared, where they remain but a few days, is not liable for the license tax.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, El Dorado county; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Action by the county of El Dorado against Meiss for a license tax on the business of raising sheep. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Modified.

Irwin & Irwin and Armstrong & Platanauer, for appellant. Prentiss Carpenter and Richard S. Miner, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. On March 3, 1891, the board of supervisors of El Dorado county passed an ordinance requiring "every person engaged in the business of raising, grazing herding or pasturing sheep and goats, or sheep or goats," in that county, to procure from the license tax collector a license therefor. The ordinance made it the duty of the license collector to collect the license, and further provided that he might enforce the collection, "as provided by section 3360 of the Political Code;" that is, by action brought for that purpose in the name of the people of the state. In April, 1891, the supervisors of the county passed another ordinance, providing generally for the collection of all license taxes in that county, and for that purpose undertook to create the office of license tax collector, and by section 3 of this ordinance it was declared: "Sec. 3. The board of supervisors, at its first regular session in each year, shall appoint a qualified elector of the county such license tax collector for the term of one year next following such appointment; provided that, until the appointment of said collector at the January session of said board, in the year 1892, T. B. Epps shall be and he is hereby constituted such license tax collector in and for said county." And by section 6 of the same ordinance "said license tax collector" was authorized, upon the failure of any person to pay the license tax imposed by any ordinance, to direct a suit to be brought against such person, in the name of the county, for the recovery of such license tax; and it was further provided that such tax should be deemed to be a debt due the county of El Dorado.

The defendant herded and pastured a band of sheep in the county of El Dorado during the summer of 1891, and, having failed to pay the license imposed by the ordinance first referred to in this opinion, the present action was brought to recover the same. The superior court, in addition to the foregoing facts, also found that the defendant was a resident of the county of Sacramento during the time his sheep were pastured in El Dorado, and that said sheep were upon the farm of defendant in Sacramento county on the first Monday in March, 1891, and were duly assessed in that county for that year, and that defendant paid the taxes thereon for that year in the county of Sacramento; and upon these facts the court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff. The defendant appeals.

1. We see no valid objection to the ordinance passed March 3, 1891, imposing a license tax upon persons engaged in the business of raising, herding, or pasturing sheep in that county. The constitutionality of a similar ordinance of the county of Mono was sustained in Ex parte Mirande, 73 Cal. 365, 14 Pac. Rep. 888. The power "to license for purposes of regulation and revenue" all and every kind of business carried on in a county and not prohibited by law, and to provide for the collection of the same by suit or otherwise, is expressly conferred upon the boards of supervisors of the several counties of the state by subdivision 27 of section 25 of the county government act; and this provision is not in conflict with, but, on the contrary, is authorized by, section 12 of article 11 of the constitution of this state, which declares: "Sec. 12. The legislature shall have no power to impose taxes upon counties, cities, towns or other public or municipal corporations, or upon the inhabitants or property thereof, for county, city, town or other municipal purposes; but may by general laws vest in the corporate authorities thereof the power to assess and collect taxes for such purposes." A license tax is a tax within the meaning of this section. People v. Martin, 60 Cal. 153. It is contended, however, by the defendant, that under this section the legislature is only authorized to confer upon the county the power to impose a license tax upon the inhabitants of such county, and that the license in question is void because it is general, and requires every person engaged in the business of sheep-raising in the county of El Dorado to pay the license, whether he is an inhabitant of the county or not. We see nothing in the language of the section of the constitution referred to which can be construed as thus limiting the power of the legislature, and supporting this contention of defendant. This section authorizes the legislature by general laws to vest in the corporate authorities of counties, cities, and towns, respectively, the power to assess and collect taxes for county or municipal purposes, but the power when conferred can only be exercised in accordance with the fundamental rule that a tax, to be valid, must be equal in its burdens and uniform in its operation; and, in view of this general principle, it has been held that a county cannot discriminate between its own citizens and those of other counties in the imposition of a license tax for carrying on any business in such county. Lassen Co. v. Cone, 72 Cal. 387, 14 Pac. Rep. 100. If the ordinance under consideration here permitted the defendant, a resident of the county of Sacramento, to carry on the business of sheep raising in El Dorado county upon more favorable terms than residents of the latter county, exempting the defendant from the payment of the tax which it imposes upon the latter for conducting the same business, it would be void, under the authority of the case last cited. It is only because it is general, and makes no discrimination whatever on account of residence between those engaged in the business upon which the license is imposed, that the ordinance can be sustained.

2. It is further claimed by the defendant that the ordinance creating the office of license tax collector for the county of El Dorado is void, because of want of power in the board of supervisors to create such an office; the duty of providing for the election or appointment of all necessary county officers, and prescribing their duties and fixing their terms of office, being devolved upon the legislature by section 5 of article 11 of the constitution. That section, so far as necessary to be here stated, is as follows: "The legislature, by general and uniform laws, shall provide for the election or appointment in the several counties of boards of supervisors, sheriffs, county clerks, district attorneys, and such other county, township, and municipal officers, as public convenience may require, and shall prescribe their duties, and fix their terms of office." It was held in the case of People v. Ferguson, 65 Cal. 288, 4 Pac. Rep. 4, that the board of supervisors of a county might create the office of license tax collector, and that the exercise of such power was not in conflict with the section of the constitution just quoted. This opinion, however, was not concurred in by all of the members of the court, and we think the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice McKee in that case, in so far as it relates to this particular point, states the correct rule. A license tax collector is an officer. He exercises a public duty in the collection of this part of the public revenue, and the board of supervisors of a county have no more power to create such an office upon their own views of public necessity or convenience than they would have to create any other kind of office deemed by them necessary or convenient for the transaction of the public business. The duty of providing for the election or appointment of the particular officers named in section 5 of article 11 of the constitution, "and such other county officers * * * as public convenience may require," and to prescribe their duties and fix their terms of office, is by this section vested exclusively in the legislature of the state, and can be exercised by no other body. The legislature cannot divest itself of this duty by any delegation of the power. "This provision of the constitution," said this court in Welsh v. Bramlet, 33 Pac. Rep. 67, "is mandatory, and must be construed, not only to give to the legislature the exclusive authority to provide for the officers in the several counties, fix their terms of office, and prescribe their duties, but also as declaring that such provision must be made 'by general and uniform laws,' and that any law which the legislature may enact upon this subject must be uniformly applicable to all the counties of the state." But, although the appointment of Epps as tax collector under the ordinance was void, we do not think this fact is sufficient to defeat the right of the county to maintain this action. The amount of the license is fixed by a valid ordinance, and the ordinance further provides that such license tax shall be deemed a debt due to the county of El Dorado, and contemplates that, in the event of its nonpayment, the county shall have the right to sue and recover the same. The fact that the ordinance prescribes that such suit shall be brought in the name of the county, by direction of the license tax collector named therein, who, as we have seen, was not legally appointed, does not deprive the county of its general power to sue and enforce payment of the license. The right of the county to sue is not dependent upon the validity of that part of the ordinance creating the office of tax collector, and appointing a person to fill it.

3. The license imposed by the ordinance is five dollars for each 100 head of sheep, and under it the defendant was not liable to pay for any fractional part of that number of sheep. It appears from the findings that the defendant was the owner of two bands of sheep, one of which he pastured in the county of El Dorado for four months during the year 1891, and in relation to the other the court found as follows: "That defendant owned another band of sheep, consisting of 1,925 head, which he drove from his farm in Sacramento county to Alpine county, where they were herded and pastured during the summer of 1891, except they were driven down to his farm in El Dorado county to be sheared, and were sheared there, remaining about seven days, when they were returned to Alpine county, where they remained until he drove them down to his farm in Sacramento county." The facts stated in this finding do not show that the sheep therein referred to were raised, herded, or pastured in the county of El Dorado within the meaning of the ordinance imposing the license tax. The language of this ordinance is that "every person engaged in the business of raising, grazing, herding, or pasturing sheep," etc., must procure the license named. It is evident, we think, that the defendant, who neither raised, herded, nor pastured this band of sheep in the county of El Dorado, and who only took and kept them there temporarily on his own farm for the purpose of shearing them, is not liable to pay any license therefor under this ordinance. Of course, the license tax cannot be evaded by the mere pretense of driving sheep through a county, or into a county, for an alleged temporary purpose, when it is evident that the real object in so doing, and what is really done, is to graze and pasture the sheep in the county. But the facts stated in this finding show no such attempted evasion of the ordinance, and the judgment of the superior court is erroneous in so far as it adjudges that defendant is liable to pay a license for simply shearing this band of sheep in the county of El Dorado. The judgment of the superior court is reversed, with directions to enter a judgment upon the findings in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, for the sum of $145, with interest thereon from June 30, 1892.

PEOPLE v. WELLS. (No. 21,001.)

COMPETENCY OF JUROR—PREVIOUSLY FORMED OPINION.

Pen. Code, § 1076, provides that no person shall be disqualified as a juror by reason of having formed an opinion upon the cause submitted to the jury, founded upon public rumor or common notoriety, if it appear to the court on his oath that he will, notwithstanding such opinion, act impartially upon the matter submitted to him. Held, that where the examination of a person as to his qualifications as a juror simply showed that he had an opinion as to the merits of the case which was based upon what parties directly interested had told him regarding the facts, there was nothing to justify the court in concluding that his opinion was formed from public rumor or common notoriety, and he was disqualified, even though he stated under oath that he could and would give defendant a fair and impartial trial.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Oscar O. Wells was convicted of felonious assault, and appeals. Reversed.

J. M. Brooks and J. W. Ballard, (Augustus A. Montano, of counsel,) for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant was convicted under an information of having committed a felonious assault upon the person of one Marion Bradley Sparks, on the 31st day of May, 1892, in the county of Orange. During the impanelment of the jury one Moulton was examined as to his qualifications, and, having stated that he had frequently conversed about the case, and that from what he had heard had formed an opinion which would take evidence to remove, he was challenged by the defendant on the ground of actual bias. The challenge was denied, and an exception taken to the ruling of the court. The defendant exhausted his peremptory challenges, and now relies upon his exception to such ruling for a reversal of the judgment. After the juror had stated that he had formed an opinion as to the merits of the cause, his examination proceeded as follows: "Question. Has your opinion been formed, Mr. Moulton, by the public rumors that you have heard from others respecting the case? Answer. My opinion was formed from what I received from others, and any man would form the same opinion had he heard the statements. The Court. Mr. Sanborn wants to know if your opinion is based upon what you heard. A. Upon facts I heard from parties directly interested in the case. Q. From what you heard from others? A. Yes, sir. Q. Facts that were of common notoriety in the neighborhood? A. The facts came to me very straight from those directly who understood the case. Q. Facts as commonly referred to in the neighborhood? A. Yes, sir. Mr. Brooks. Q. Is it from mere public rumor and common notoriety that you have formed your opinion, or is it from the direct statements made to you from some one? A. It is from statements made by some one else to me." The juror further stated in answer to an inquiry of the court that, notwithstanding the opinion which he now had, he could and would act fairly and impartially upon the matters submitted to him, if he were accepted as a juror.

Actual bias is defined in section 1073 of the Penal Code to be "the existence of a state of mind on the part of the juror in reference to the case, or to either of the parties, which will prevent him from acting with entire impartiality and without prejudice to the substantial rights of either party." It is also provided in section 1076 that no person shall be disqualified as a juror by reason of having formed an opinion upon the matter or cause to be submitted to such jury, "founded upon public rumor, statements in public journals, or common notoriety, if it shall appear to the court upon his declaration under oath that he can and will, notwithstanding such an opinion, act impartially and fairly upon the matters submitted to him." Whether the state of mind of the juror is such as to constitute actual bias within the above definition is a question of fact to be determined by the court, and the court in determining that fact must also determine whether any opinion which the juror may have formed was founded upon public rumor, statements in public journals or common notoriety. The court's decision upon these points, when the evidence disclosed upon the examination of the juror is susceptible of different constructions, is to be regarded on appeal like its determination of any other question of fact resting upon the weight or construction of evidence. At the same time there must be some evidence to support the finding of the court that the juror's opinion is founded upon public rumor, or common notoriety. If there is an entire absence of evidence to support such a finding, the court has no authority to declare such to be the fact. At common law a juror who entered the box with an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused was ipso facto disqualified from acting in the case, but section 1076 of the Penal Code of this state, already quoted, creates an innovation upon this principle, and declares an exception to the common-law rule. But, in order that a juror disqualified at common law by reason of having previously formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, may come within this provision of the statute, it must appear affirmatively to the court from the evidence before it that such opinion is formed from public rumors, or statements of public journals, or common notoriety; and it must further appear to the court by the juror's declaration under oath that, notwithstanding such opinion, he can and will act fairly and impartially upon the matters to be submitted to him. The examination of the juror in this case simply discloses that he had an opinion as to the merits of the case, and that opinion was based upon what parties directly interested had told him regarding the facts. There is certainly nothing in that statement to justify the court in drawing the conclusion that his opinion was formed from public rumor or common notoriety. Conceding that the words "directly interested" are somewhat vague and indefinite, and do not necessarily refer to parties who are competent witnesses to the facts, still in no sense are they consistent with an inference that the statements were mere repetitions of public rumors, or matters of common notoriety. But, omitting from the statement of the juror that these things came to him from parties directly interested in the case, and allowing the examination to rest upon the sole fact that the juror entered the box with an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, that fact of itself is a disqualification under the law, and it is a disqualification even though the juror should declare to the court under oath that, notwithstanding such opinion, he would and could act fairly and impartially upon the matters to be submitted to him. The juror would not only be disqualified at common law, but disqualified under the Penal Code, for he has not brought himself within the provisions of section 1076; for those provisions require an affirmative showing to the court that his opinion is based upon public rumor, common notoriety, or statements from public journals. Such a showing is not made in this case. There is no evidence whatever to support such a finding of fact, and such a finding of fact is necessary in order that the challenge for actual bias could be properly denied. The right of the defendant to appeal to this court upon the exception here involved I think cannot be questioned, and my views upon the subject are fully stated in the concurring opinion rendered in the case of People v. Wong Ark, 96 Cal. 125, 30 Pac. Rep. 1115. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

ELLEDGE v. NATIONAL CITY & O. RY.
CO. (No. 19,167.)¹

MASTER AND SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—DANGEROUS PREMISES—EVIDENCE.

1. A railroad company which sets a laborer to work near an overhanging embankment, with knowledge on the part of its foreman that there is a crack in the embankment, conspicuous from the rear, but not visible from the front, is liable to the laborer for injuries sustained from the falling of the embankment, since it failed to provide him with a safe place in which to work.

2. The fact that the embankment may have been secure when the excavation commenced, and that it became unsafe by the process of excavation, does not affect the company's liability to plaintiff, who entered its employ a few hours before he was injured, since, so far as he is concerned, the place was dangerous when he was set to work.

3. Knowledge as to the dangerous character of the place by the foreman, charged with performing whatever duty the company owed its employes, is imputable to the company itself, so as to render it liable for plaintiff's injuries.

4. In an action against a railroad company for personal injuries sustained by one of its laborers, owing to the fall of an overhanging embankment, an exclamation by defendant's foreman when the accident happened, "My God! I expected that!" is admissible as part of the res gestae.

5. An instruction that proof of defendant's negligence is made out "when" certain facts are shown is not objectionable, as assuming that such proof has been made.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by John Elledge against the National City & Otay Railway Company for personal injuries. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Luce & McDonald, for appellant. Wellborn, Stevens & Wellborn, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Plaintiff sues for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Plaintiff avers that he was employed by defendant as a laborer, and engaged under its direction in loading stone upon a car, and "that the car on which defendant was loading stone as aforesaid, on said day, was placed by said defendant, and stood during said day, near and alongside, to wit, about ten feet of a rock or cliff or embankment; that said cliff was of stone, and was thought by plaintiff to be solid and secure, and plaintiff, prior to the falling of said cliff, as hereinafter described, had no knowledge or intimation that said cliff was insecure, or that the place where he was working was unsafe or dangerous, but that defendant, by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, could have known that said cliff was insecure and dangerous; and that defendant did well know that said cliff was insecure and dangerous, and liable to fall, but withheld all knowledge of such facts from plaintiff. The answer consists of denials. A verdict for the plaintiff was rendered for $3,000 damages. The appeal is from the judgment, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The defendant is a corporation operating a line of railroad in San Diego, and plaintiff was a section hand in the employ of defendant, engaged in loading rock from a bank or cliff on one of defendant's cars for use in the repair of the roadbed. The car stood from 8 to 10 feet from a bank nearly vertical, from 10 to 16 feet high, formed by a cut made in the construction of the road. The work had been progressing at that point for three or four days, at least. How long, does not appear. The work was done under the direction of Jerry O'Connell, road master, who had authority to employ and discharge men, and did employ the plaintiff. The plaintiff had on previous occasions been in the employ of defendant, but had never, previously, been employed in blasting rock. On the last employment, he commenced work about 7 o'clock in the morning of the day on which he was injured. When he reached the place, he found no foreman there, but he and a fellow workman, finding drills, put three blasts in the bank about ten feet from the cliff which afterwards fell, to his injury. About three hours after the last blast, while plaintiff and others were loading a car under the immediate direction of O'Connell, some rocks and earth slid down, injuring plaintiff. At the trial, defendant introduced no evidence, and in its motion for a new trial, and on this appeal contends (1) that the injury was caused solely by mischance and accident, or by the negligence of plaintiff and his fellow servants; (2) there is no evidence showing negligence on the part of defendant. Respondent contends that the injury occurred because a safe place was not provided, in which he could perform his service. It is charged "that plaintiff, without any fault or negligence on his part, but owing entirely and solely to the gross carelessness and negligence of the defendant, in requiring and allowing plaintiff to work in said dangerous place, and in failing to warn and notify plaintiff that the place was dangerous, and that said cliff was loose, insecure, and dangerous, was injured as above set out." The liability of the defendant is therefore based entirely upon the charge that it failed to furnish a safe place in which to work, but, on the contrary, set him to work at an unsafe place, knowing its insecurity, while plaintiff was wholly ignorant of its dangerous character.

In the late case of Daves v. Southern Pac. Co., (Cal.) 32 Pac. Rep. 708, the law upon this vexed subject was fully considered. In that case, Bresnahan, the section foreman, had full authority to employ and discharge men, and they were entirely subject to his orders during their employment. One morning they had started out upon a hand car to the place where they were to be employed. A train being due, they turned upon a side track to avoid it. Bresnahan carried the key to the switch, and himself unlocked it and turned it. He then directed the deceased to examine the hand car, to see what repairs were needed upon it. Daves stooped down under the car to do so, and the incoming train ran upon the side track, through the carelessness of Bresnahan in leaving the switch open, and Daves was crushed. It was held that the fact that Bresnahan had authority to employ and discharge the men, with full control over them in performing their work, was immaterial; that an employer owes certain duties to his employees, which he cannot avoid responsibility for by delegating to another; that whoever is authorized and required to perform this duty for the master represents the master as to the performance of that duty, and no further. Grade of employment is of no consequence. The question is, "Was, then, the act or omission which caused the injury a personal duty which the defendant corporation owed to the deceased while he was engaged in the performance of his duty as its employee? If it was, and the deceased was not at fault, then the defendant corporation was liable; otherwise, not." The duties which an employer owes to his employees are said to be: "To furnish suitable machinery and appliances by which the service is to be performed, and to keep them in repair and order; to exercise ordinary care in the selection and retention of sufficient and competent servants to properly conduct the business in which the servant is employed; and to make such provision for the safety of the employees as will reasonably protect them against the dangers incident to their employment." It was held that the corporate defendant in that case was not liable, because the place was, "of itself, in the first instance, a reasonably safe one," and was made unsafe solely through the negligence of Bresnahan in leaving the switch turned upon the side track, when he ought to have turned it back to the main track; that, in this act, Bresnahan, though having entire control of the workmen and the switch, did not represent the corporation, but was merely a fellow workman with Daves. He did not represent the employer, because the corporation had discharged its duty, in providing a safe place in which to do the work, and was not responsible if the place was rendered unsafe by the negligence of the fellow workmen of Daves. In the case at hand, it appears that the plaintiff had been engaged in excavating where the accident occurred for several days; that there was a seam or crack, as some of the witnesses call it, behind the part of the bank that slid off, conspicuous from the rear, but not visible from the front; that O'Connell, who certainly represented the defendant for the purpose of performing whatever duty it owed to its employees, knew all about it. On the Saturday previous to the accident, his attention was called to it, and, when the car was placed in position, O'Connell again noticed it, and one of the men said, "She still hangs," and O'Connell replied, "Yes; it is liable to stay there until about the first rains," and the workman replied, "Yes, and liable to come down at any time, too." Plaintiff was then called from another point, and set to work filling the car, soon after which the accident occurred. When O'Connell saw what had happened, he said to a workman: "My God! I expected that! Run and help McCann." McCann and plaintiff were each partly buried in the debris. Plaintiff had been in defendant's employ for about five hours before the accident. He had not been warned as to the dangerous condition of the cliff, and knew nothing of it. The crack was not visible from the front, where he was at work. Here it is evident the employer had not performed the duty it owed to the servant. He was set to work in a place known to be, or which the employer ought to have known was, unsafe. He was not informed of the danger. Under the rule laid down in Daves v. Southern Pac. Co., the defendant is liable.

Appellant argues that, if the place was unsafe, it was in this case, as in the Daves Case, made unsafe by the workmen; that the bank was probably sufficiently secure when the excavation commenced, and, if it afterwards became unsafe, it was due to the manner in which the work was conducted. It is true the rule announced does not go so far as to hold, expressly, that an employer is bound to his servant to afford such superintendence and control as will afford reasonable protection against the acts of fellow servants in the discharge of their respective duties, nor is it necessary to do so here. If the bank was made unsafe by the process of excavation, it was before the employment of plaintiff. The workmen were not then his fellow servants. So far as he is concerned, the work commenced that morning, and there was evidence which tended to show that the bank had become dangerous before that time.

It is further argued that O'Connell's knowledge of the insecurity was but the knowledge of a fellow laborer, and cannot be imputed to the defendant. The defendant not being a sentient being, knowledge can only be imputed to it when some agent is chargeable with it. The evidence leaves no doubt upon the proposition that O'Connell was the agent who was required to perform whatever duty defendant owed to its employees. "If the act was one which it was the duty of the employer to perform towards its servants, and one of them negligently performed it, to the injury of another servant in the same common employment, then the offending servant, in the performance of such duty, acted as the representative or agent of his employer, for which the employer is responsible."

Daves v. Southern Pac. Co., 98 Cal. —, 32 Pac. Rep. 708. The danger, upon any proper examination, was "conspicuous," though the evidence was not visible where plaintiff was at work. Defendant must be held to have known of it.

Appellant also alleges some errors of law at the trial:

1. He contends that it was error to permit the witness to state, against his objection, the exclamation of O'Connell when the cliff came down. This is plainly part of the res gestae. It was unpremeditated, and could hardly have been made if O'Connell had not feared that it might come down. It does not depend for its probative force upon O'Connell's veracity, and therein is entirely unlike a deliberate admission made after the event.

2. Objection is made to certain instructions given at the request of plaintiff. All but one are founded upon the proposition that O'Connell was not shown to be the representative of the defendant at the time of the accident. They do not require further discussion. The other is the tenth, which is as follows: "The burden of proof as to the defendant's or its agent's knowledge, or culpability in lacking knowledge, of any insecurity and dangerousness of said cliff, is on the plaintiff; but this proof is sufficiently made out by the plaintiff when it is shown that said cliff was insecure and dangerous in such respect that, if a proper inspection had been made by defendant, the security and danger would have been ascertained in time to have prevented the injury." The objection is to the use of the word "when," instead of "whenever" or "if." It is said that it assumes that such proof was made. This is against the manifest intention. A proposition is laid down in the first part of the instruction to the effect that the burden is on the plaintiff to prove certain facts. The last part simply tells what evidence is sufficient for that purpose. I do not think the jury were misled. I recommend that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

KEYES et al. v. CYRUS et al. (No. 15,294.) (Supreme Court of California. Nov. 10, 1893.)

PROBATE HOMESTEAD—EXEMPTION FROM SURVIVORS' DEBTS.

The homestead set apart to a widow under Code Civil Proc. § 1465, which provides that, if no homestead has been selected in the lifetime of the deceased, the probate court must select a homestead "for the use of the surviving husband or wife and the minor children," is exempt, not only from the claims of the creditors of the deceased husband, but also from her own debts contracted by her previous to his death. Reatty, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. F. Crawford, Judge.

Action by H. M. Keyes and others against Henry E. Cyrus and others to restrain an execution sale of certain land. From a judgment in plaintiffs' favor, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Barham & Bolton, for appellants. Rose & Pond and J. W. Oates, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. July 22, 1889, M. M. Keyes and Barbara Keyes, his wife, made their promissory note to John Cyrus for $7,175, and as security for its payment executed to him a mortgage upon certain lands in Sonoma county. M. M. Keyes died October 17, 1889, and his widow, Barbara, was appointed administratrix of his estate, and continued to act as such until August 10, 1891, when her final accounts were settled, and she was discharged from her trust. No homestead had been selected in the lifetime of said Keyes, and on June 30, 1890, the superior court for Sonoma county, upon due proceedings had therefor, by its order made that day, set apart as a homestead for the use of the said Barbara certain lands belonging to the estate of said Keyes other than those included in the mortgage, and on the 7th of July a copy of the said order was recorded in the office of the county recorder. The property so set apart as a homestead was community property of the said Barbara and her husband, and he left no minor children surviving him. At the time the land was set apart to her, Barbara was residing thereon, and continued to reside there until December 17, 1891, when she conveyed the premises to the plaintiffs. After the death of Keyes, Cyrus presented to the administratrix a claim against his estate upon the note and mortgage, which was duly allowed and approved, and thereafter, in an action instituted in the said superior court for the foreclosure of the mortgage, a judgment was rendered against said Barbara as administratrix, and also individually, for the amount of the note, and directing a sale of the mortgaged premises and the application of the proceeds thereof upon the judgment, and, if there should be any deficiency, that it should be docketed against said Barbara. Under this judgment the mortgaged lands were sold June 15, 1891, and, the proceeds being insufficient to satisfy the judgment, the deficiency thereof, amounting to $3,798, was docketed against Barbara on the 16th of June, 1891. January 5, 1892, the defendants herein, to whom Cyrus had assigned his judgment, caused an execution to be issued on this deficiency judgment, and placed in the hands of the sheriff, under which he levied upon the lands that had been set apart to Barbara, and was advertising the same for sale, when the plaintiffs brought this action to restrain the said sale. Judgment was rendered in their favor, and the defendants have appealed.

The cause is brought here upon the judgment roll alone, and the question presented for determination is whether a homestead set apart to the widow by the superior court under the provisions of section 1465, Code Civil Proc., is liable to forced sale for a debt contracted by her previous to the death of her husband. The affirmative of this proposition is maintained by the appellants, upon the ground that the section of the statute authorizing the court to set apart a homestead out of the estate of a decedent contains no express declaration that when set apart it shall be exempt from forced sale, while on the part of the respondents it is contended that every legal homestead, whether made so by voluntary selection or by the action of the court, is exempt from a forced sale. The word "homestead" has both a popular and a legal signification. In its popular sense it signifies the place of the home,—the residence of the family; "it represents the dwelling house at which the family resides, with the usual and customary appurtenances, including the outbuildings of every kind necessary or convenient for family use, and lands used for the purposes thereof." Gregg v. Bostwick, 33 Cal. 227. It is in this sense that the word is used in the constitution, and also in the statute; in other words, it is the actual homestead to which they refer, and to which they purport to add certain legal incidents. The term itself is nearly as old as the English language, but its use in legislation is quite modern, and is peculiarly American. The ultimate object of all legislation respecting the homestead is to protect the family in the right to preserve their home, both from their own improvidence, and also from the rapacity of their creditors; and, in view of this fact, it is proper to assume that any legislation upon the subject of the homestead is intended for its protection, and that when the legislature has made provision for setting apart a homestead out of the property of a decedent, it was its intention that it should be exempt from forced sale. Such statutes, being remedial in their nature, are to be construed liberally, and in favor of carrying out the manifest purpose of the legislature, rather than that their operation be restricted to the strict letter in which they are framed. The policy of such legislation has never been questioned. It is in furtherance of the welfare of the state that its citizens shall be a permanent body, whose individual interests in its prosperity and development shall, as far as possible, be identified with the public interest.

A consideration of the terms used in the chapter of the Code of Civil Procedure in which section 1465 is contained corroborates the conclusion that the legislature intended that the homestead set apart under its provisions should have the legal incident of exemption from forced sale. The chapter is itself entitled, "Of the provision for the support of the family, and of the homestead; and the heading to article 1 of the chapter in which this particular section is found is, "Of the provision for the support of the family." These headings are a portion of the statute, and may be examined for the purpose of determining the particular intent of the legislature with regard to the chapters in which they are placed. Barnes v. Jones, 51 Cal. 306. Section 1465 itself provides that, if no homestead has been selected in the lifetime of the decedent, the court must select a homestead "for the use of the surviving husband or wife and the minor children;" and section 1466 provides that, if the amount set apart under this section be insufficient for the support of the family, the court must make a further allowance for their maintenance, thus showing that whatever is set apart under section 1465 is for the "support" as well as the "use" of the family. The authority given to the court in the first part of section 1465 to set apart for the family "all the property exempt from execution, including the homestead selected," implies that the property, when set apart, is exempt from execution; and the subsequent provision therein for setting apart a homestead in case none has been selected during the lifetime of the decedent also implies that such homestead has the same exemption from forced sale as a homestead that had been selected by the decedent in his lifetime. The manifest object of the section is the support of the family, and to make provision for their support and maintenance. These demands of the family are deemed superior to those of heirs or creditors. Estate of Moore, 57 Cal. 442. "Setting apart a homestead is a part of the probate proceeding as much as is a family allowance." "It is a right bestowed by the beneficence of the law of this state for the benefit of the family." Id. A homestead may be set apart to the widow, even though the estate be insolvent, and the property so set apart constitute the entire estate of the decedent; but, if the homestead thus set apart to her could be immediately taken in execution by one of her creditors, it would fail to be available for her use or support, and it might happen that her creditor would fare better than a creditor of the decedent whose money had perhaps been used to purchase the very property so set apart. The question here presented was not involved in Estate of Walley, 11 Nev. 260, and what was said thereon in the opinion in that case was not concurred in by the full court.

As the general policy of the law is to protect the homestead of the family, the foregoing construction of this section harmonizes with that policy, and is consistent, rather than in conflict, with the provisions of the Civil Code for creating a homestead. Those provisions do not, either in terms or by implication, make that the exclusive mode of impressing the actual homestead with the legal incident of exemption from forced sale.

They relate exclusively to its voluntary selection, and afford a mode of designating it and making it a matter of record, so that the world may have notice of the property which constitutes the actual homestead. A homestead selected under these provisions has also certain other incidents in addition to its exemption from forced sale; such, for example, as the character of the estate created thereby, and the right of survivorship incident to that estate. Section 1240 of the Civil Code, which declares that "the homestead is exempt from execution or forced sale, except as in this title provided," is not in terms limited to the homestead selected by the parties, and, as the Codes are to be construed as a single statute, (Pol. Code, § 4480,) the provisions of this section must be held to apply to every homestead, whether selected and recorded by the voluntary act of the parties or by an order of the superior court. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; DE HAVEN, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; FITZGERALD, J.; PATERSON, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent upon grounds which are fully stated in the opinion in Estate of Walley, 11 Nev. 260. The homestead set apart by the probate court goes to the surviving husband or wife freed of all liability for any debt of the deceased spouse, but there is no provision of law exempting it from liability for debts of the survivor, whether contracted before or after the order setting it apart, and nothing, therefore, to prevent the operation of the general rule prescribed by section 688, Code Civil Proc. Nor is it at all necessary, in order to subserve the general policy of the law, to construe the statute as it is construed in the opinion of the court. When a homestead has been set apart by the probate court to a widow, and thus exempted from the claims of creditors of the deceased husband, if she desires to exempt it from the claims of her own creditors, she has only to make a declaration as head of a family if she has children or other dependent relatives residing with her, in which case it is exempt to the full value of $5,000; or if she has no children or dependent relatives she can, like others similarly situated, secure exemption to the extent of $1,000. This gives her all the advantages of other persons in her situation, and I can see no reason for giving her any greater right as against the debts that she voluntarily contracts.

PETERSEN v. TAYLOR. (No. 15,116.)

PLEADING—FAILURE TO DENY EXECUTION OF WRITING—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. In an action for money had and received, the complaint alleged that defendant had on July 2, 1884, executed a written instrument certifying that he held $655 until certain disputes should be settled between two named claimants of the fund, and that both of the claimants had three years later assigned the certificate to plaintiff. The answer alleged that the dispute was settled on July 8, 1884, six days after the date of the certificate, and that both the claimants had on that day executed to defendant a written release of all their rights to the money, a copy of which was set out in the answer. Held, that plaintiff's failure to deny the execution of the release by affidavit filed with the clerk of court, as required by Code Civil Proc. § 448, admitted the genuineness and due execution of the release, and it must be taken to be what it appears to be on its face.

2. Where findings are waived, every presumption in support of the judgment must be indulged, except such as are cut off by the specifications of error; and though there is nothing in the testimony, all of which is certified to be in the record on appeal, showing the date of the execution of a written instrument, the judgment cannot be attacked on appeal for the insufficiency of the evidence in this respect, where this particular ground of insufficiency was not called to the attention of the trial court in the specifications.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. Hoge, Judge.

Action by one Petersen against Jos. W. Taylor to recover money alleged to have been received by defendant for plaintiff's use. From a judgment in defendant's favor, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Nagle & Nagle, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to recover the sum of $780 claimed to be due plaintiff on two causes of action; the first is for $125 alleged to have been received by the defendant from one Calvert for the use and benefit of plaintiff, and the other is for $655, which it is alleged the defendant holds for plaintiff as assignee of E. & B. Bonnett, under a certificate of which the following is a copy: "This is to certify that I have the sum of $655.00 collected from the city and county of San Francisco in the suits of B. Bonnett and C. H. Parker vs. The City and County of San Francisco, claimed by Elie Bonnett, but attached in the suits of Petersen vs. B. Bonnett as the money of B. Bonnett, to abide settlement or suit against me to determine the ownership of said sum. July 2, 1884. Jos. W. Taylor." Findings were waived, judgment was entered in favor of defendant, and plaintiff has appealed.

As to the first cause of action, it is sufficient to say there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, and the judgment of the court thereon must stand.

The plaintiff alleged that after defendant collected from the city and county of San Francisco the $655 referred to in the last cause of action stated, and assigned and delivered to Elie Bonnett, for the benefit of all concerned, the certificate above mentioned, all disputes about the ownership of the money were settled, and the interests therein of both Elie and B. were sold and transferred to plaintiff; that thereafter, to wit, on December 1, 1887, plaintiff notified defendant of the assignment to him, and demanded payment, which demand was refused. In his answer, defendant denied plaintiff's ownership of the $655, or any part thereof, but admitted that he signed and delivered the instrument set forth in the complaint. He alleged that all disputes were settled, and the ownership of the property determined, on July 8, 1884, and a written release given, of which the following is a copy: "We have this day settled all of our affairs, and the judgments in the actions of B. Bonnett vs. The City and County of San Francisco and C. H. Parker vs. The City and County of San Francisco belong to Jos. W. Taylor. [Signed] B. Bonnett. Elie Bonnett. Jos. W. Taylor." He also pleaded in bar of the statute of limitations, and two judgments in his favor in actions brought by plaintiff against him upon the same cause of action. At the trial the instrument called a "certificate" was introduced in evidence, with proof of its assignment to plaintiff November 30, 1887, and that the money had never been paid to Elie Bonnett or plaintiff. B. Bonnett testified that Petersen had a judgment against him for $655, and attached that amount in his hands, which moneys belonged to Elie, but which Taylor thought belonged to him, (B.) that Taylor collected several thousand dollars on the claim of Elie against the city and county of San Francisco, which he had assigned to Taylor for collection; that the $655 was a part of this money, and Taylor, instead of paying it over, agreed to hold it as custodian till all disputes concerning the ownership thereof should be settled. Upon this showing, appellant claims that he was entitled to recover for money had and received. The contention, however, ignores the effect of the failure to deny the execution of the written instrument set out in the answer. Section 448, Code Civil Proc., provides that: "When the defense to an action is founded on a written instrument, and a copy thereof is contained in the answer, or is annexed thereto, the genuineness and due execution of such instrument are deemed admitted unless the plaintiff file with the clerk, within ten days after receiving a copy of the answer, an affidavit denying the same, and serve a copy thereof on the defendant." It is not claimed that any such affidavit was filed in this case. The genuineness and due execution of the instrument were therefore admitted, and it must be taken to be what it appears to be on its face. Sloan v. Diggins, 49 Cal. 38.

Plaintiff alleged in his complaint that the money was to be held by the defendant, under the certificate above referred to, "until certain disputes then existing in the ownership thereof should be settled and determined between one Elie Bonnett and B. Bonnett." The answer alleges that such settlement was made on the 8th day of July, 1884, at which time the statement of the settlement was signed by the three parties above-named. The certificate is dated July 2, 1884. The settlement was made six days later. Appellant contends that, as the settlement is not dated, it may have been executed the day before this action was commenced, and after the assignment to him of the certificate; but, as findings were waived, every presumption in support of the judgment must be indulged, except such as are cut off by the specifications. The appellant's specifications, in this case, are insufficient as a basis for an attack upon the ground that the agreement was not entered into on the date alleged in the answer.

At the conclusion of the evidence, it is said, in the statement, that "the foregoing was all of the testimony of the parties," and appellant contends that, as there is nothing in the testimony which shows the date of the execution of the instrument set out in the answer, and above referred to, no presumption can be indulged, so far as the date of the instrument is concerned, and no specification was needed. But we understand the rule to be without exception that, where a decision is attacked on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence, the particulars in which the evidence is claimed to be insufficient must be stated. The objection cannot be raised for the first time in this court. It is only fair to the court below, and to the party resisting a motion for a new trial, that their attention should be called before the statement is settled to the particulars in which the moving party claims the evidence is insufficient. Judgment and order affirmed.

BLACKBURN et al. v. NELSON. (No. 19,-212.)

BOUNDARIES—MONUMENTS—COURSES AND DISTANCES.

In order to locate an intermediate post in a survey of land, which was run also by courses and distances, the footsteps of the surveyor should be followed, instead of taking a reverse course.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action by D. D. Blackburn and others against Andrew Nelson to quiet title. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for appellant. Graves & Graves, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. Action to quiet title. The appeal is taken from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and the only question involved is as to the location of the western boundary line of the rancho Pasa de Robles. The rancho was surveyed in 1859, and its boundary lines, as far as it is necessary to examine them for the purposes of this case, are described as commencing at a post marked "P. R. No. 3;" then west 84 chains and 20 links to a post marked "P. R. No. 4;" thence south 255 chains 87 links to the corners of sections 31, 32, 5, and 6. There is no dispute either as to the location of P. R. No. 3, or the termination of the west line at the point where the four sections corner, but the post marked "P. R. No. 4" is destroyed; and this litigation is the result, for the location of the corner where that post originally stood is determinative of the merits of this case. The township of government land lying immediately west of the aforesaid rancho was surveyed and sectionized in 1869, long after the title to the rancho was settled, and its exterior boundaries finally located. Hence, if any conflict arises between these respective surveys, the grant survey must prevail. Appellant contends that P. R. No. 4 should be located by running north 255 chains and 87 links from the corner of the four sections mentioned. Respondents insist that the northwest corner of the rancho should be located by running west from P. R. No. 3 84 chains and 20 links, and with this determination we agree. The northwest corner of the rancho is located by the patent at a post marked "P. R. No. 4." It is also located as being 84 chains and 20 links west of a post marked "P. R. No. 3." Hence, it is not only located by a monument, but by course and distance. The location by monument is valueless, for the monument has disappeared. Hence, the course and distance is necessarily controlling. If the patent had referred to no monument at this corner of the rancho, but had located the corner simply by the course and distance given, then no question could arise but that the corner should be 84 chains and 20 links west of P. R. No. 3; and the monument having disappeared, and there being no oral testimony as to its former location, the case is here presented as if no monument marked "P. R. No. 4" was referred to in the patent. In locating P. R. No. 4, the court has followed the footsteps of the surveyor, rather than to take the reverse course, and run a north line from the common section corner, and this is the proper course. There is no reason why the north line of the grant should be shortened to 75 chains and 59 links, which is the point where appellant locates P. R. No. 3, and thus contradict the calls of the patent in this regard, in order that the west line should run due south, and conform to the calls of the patent. If the west line of the rancho cannot run due south without shortening the north line, then, as between the two lines, the course of the west line must give way, for it runs to a monument, and the monument is controlling. The question here presented is elementary, and we see no necessity for a citation of authority. Judgment affirmed.

WREN v. WREN. (No. 14,296.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—AGREEMENTS BETWEEN—WIFE'S EARNINGS.

1. Under Civil Code, § 158, allowing husband and wife to enter into any engagement or transaction with each other respecting property, and section 159, providing that they may by contract alter their legal relations to property, and section 160, making their mutual consent a sufficient consideration for such an agreement, a husband may relinquish to his wife his right in money to be earned by her in nursing and boarding a person, so that she may sue therefor without joining him. Read v. Rahm, 4 Pac. Rep. 111, 65 Cal. 343, explained.

2. She is not required in such case to allege that defendant had notice of the agreement between herself and husband when the services were rendered.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by Wren against Wren. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Frank J. Sullivan, for appellant. Mich. Mullany and Wm. Grant, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The plaintiff, who is a married woman, brought this action to recover $300 from the defendant for personal services as a nurse, alleged to have been rendered by her to him. At the time these services were rendered, the plaintiff and her husband were living together, and the defendant was an inmate of their house, but neither the plaintiff nor her husband was under any natural or legal obligation to care for the defendant without charge. In addition to the foregoing facts, it is alleged in the complaint that, prior to the rendition of the services mentioned, it was orally agreed between plaintiff and her husband that she should have and receive all moneys earned by her in nursing defendant as her sole and separate property. The superior court sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and thereupon rendered judgment in favor of defendant.

The sole question to be determined on this appeal is whether the complaint shows that the earnings of plaintiff in nursing defendant became her separate property, or whether such earnings constitute community property, for which her husband alone has the right to sue. The earnings of a wife during marriage and while living with her husband and in his house are community property, and, as such, are subject to the management, control, and disposition of the husband; but the husband may relinquish to the wife the right to such earnings, and when he has done so they become the separate property of the wife. This general proposition is not disputed by defendant, but he contends that the agreement alleged in the complaint did not have this effect, because it related to future earnings, something not then in existence, and therefore not the subject of a verbal gift. We do not, however, regard this agreement as constituting a "gift," pure and simple, in the legal sense of that term. Section 158 of the Civil Code provides that "either husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property which either might if unmarried;" and section 159 of the same Code provides that a husband and wife may by contract alter their legal relations as to property; and the succeeding section makes the mutual consent of the parties thereto a sufficient consideration for such an agreement. Under these sections, there can be no doubt that a husband and wife may agree between themselves, without any other consideration than their mutual consent, that money earned by the wife in performing any work or service which does not devolve upon her by reason of the marriage relation shall belong to her as her own, and, when money has been earned by the wife under such an understanding or agreement with the husband, it is her separate property, and she may maintain an action to recover the same. An agreement between husband and wife by which the husband relinquishes all claim to the earnings of the wife, is one which relates to the acquisition of property by the wife, and is an engagement or transaction respecting property, within the meaning of section 158 of the Civil Code, above cited. This same question arose in the case of Riley v. Mitchell, 36 Minn. 3, 29 N. W. Rep. 588. Under section 4, c. 69, of the General Statutes of that state, (1878,) husband and wife are given the right to "contract with each other as fully as if the relation of husband and wife did not exist," except in matters concerning real estate; and the supreme court in that case held that an agreement between husband and wife that the latter might receive the compensation to be earned by her in nursing a boarder in the family gave her the right to such earnings, and the consequent right to maintain an action for the purpose of collecting the same. The court in that case said: "While it may be true that a married woman will not, solely by virtue of the provisions in Gen. St. 1878, c. 69, § 1, be entitled to moneys due from boarders or others earned by her in and about the keeping and management of the family household, there can be no doubt that under section 4, same chapter, she may become entitled to receive the same by virtue of a contract between herself and her husband. We do not mean by this that they may stipulate for a pecuniary compensation to be paid by one to the other for performing the duties that pertain to the relation, such as caring for and managing the family, and the household of the family, but confine the proposition to services rendered to others, and compensation from others for such services." We think this may be regarded as a correct statement of the right given to husband and wife to contract with each other in relation to the savings of the wife by the sections of our own Civil Code above cited. It must be conceded that there is language found in the opinion of this court in the case of Read v. Rahm, 65 Cal. 343, 4 Pac. Rep. 111, which seems to sustain the contention of defendant here that the alleged agreement between the plaintiff and her husband was in the nature of a gift, and ineffectual for that purpose, because it related to future earnings. The following is the language contained in that opinion which is relied upon by the defendant: "There can be no doubt that any indebtedness due from Welsh for board for himself and sons was due to the community, nor could the husband make a gift to his wife of his interest in what should be paid by Welsh for such board in the future. He could not give that which he had not yet acquired." The question involved in that case related to the effect of a deed made by the wife by the direction of her husband in settlement of an indebtedness due to the community, and the court held that such deed operated as a gift from the husband to the wife. As this was the only question before the court, it is evident that its attention was not particularly called to the different matter referred to in the above quotation, and what is there said cannot be regarded as an authoritative decision upon the point presented here. The plaintiff was not required to allege in her complaint that the defendant had notice of the agreement between herself and husband at the time of the rendition of the services mentioned in the complaint. This point was also passed upon in the case of Riley v. Mitchell, 36 Minn. 3, 29 N. W. Rep. 588, and we think was there correctly decided. It was held in that case that, when there is no question of set-off existing in favor of the defendant against the husband at the time of the rendition of the services, it makes no difference whether the defendant was or was not informed at the time that the wife, and not the husband, was to receive the pay for such services. Judgment reversed, with directions to the superior court to overrule the demurrer to the complaint. The appeal from the order sustaining the demurrer is dismissed.

CLARKE v. BAIRD. (No. 15,178.)

APPEAL—RECORD.

On appeal by plaintiff from an order vacating an order for the inspection of books of account, and from an order denying a motion to strike out defendant's answer, no error is shown where the record states that final judgment was rendered for plaintiff several months before the order for inspection was made, and before the motion to strike out, and the purpose of the order and motion at such a time is not disclosed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Action by Johanna F. Clarke, administratrix, against Andrew Baird. From an order vacating an order for the inspection of books of account, and from an order denying a motion to strike out defendant's answer, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Alfr. Clarke, for appellant. H. C. Schaertzer, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The transcript contains two notices of appeal,—the first from an order vacating "an order for inspection of certain books of account," made at the instance of plaintiff; and the second "from the order denying plaintiff's motion to strike out the answer of defendant," on the alleged ground that he had refused to give his deposition in the case. The transcript consists of two bills of exceptions, one to each order appealed from, but contains no part of the pleadings in the action. It is stated in each of the bills of exception that "plaintiff recovered judgment November 28, 1891," but not even the substance or nature of the judgment is stated. It appears that the order for the inspection of books of account was an ex parte order, made on July 15, 1892, seven and a half months after the judgment in favor of plaintiff, and that the order vacating the above-mentioned order was made on July 29, 1892. Plaintiff's motion to strike out defendant's answer was heard and denied on July 29, 1892. It is difficult to conceive what lawful purpose could have been subserved by striking out defendant's answer, and inspecting his accounts with a third person, (Hannah Wittram,) or even with the plaintiff, eight months after final judgment; and surely no such purpose is made to appear by the bills of exception. From aught that appears in the record, it would seem that plaintiff should have moved to strike out defendant's answer, and to inspect his books before judgment, if she was entitled to such relief in that action. Had she done so, the action of the court, if properly excepted to, might have been reviewed on appeal from the judgment. As the record discloses no error, the orders appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

McFARLAND and FITZGERALD, JJ. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the orders are affirmed.

DE HAVEN, J. I do not think either of the orders appealed from an appealable order, but, as the practical effect of a dismissal of the appeals is the same as their affirmation, I concur in the judgment affirming the same.

ASEVADO et al. v. ORR et al. (No. 18,139.)

INJUNCTION — DAMAGES — ACTION ON THE CASE — BOND — PLEADING — DEMURRER — JURY.

1. An action on the case will not lie for improperly suing out an injunction unless it is charged in the complaint as an abuse of the process of the court through malice and without probable cause.

2. The voluntary dismissal of an action is not an admission of want of probable cause.

3. Where it is not alleged in an action on an injunction bond that plaintiff in the injunction suit is a party thereto, the action cannot be maintained against him.

4. To determine the liability of the obligors in an injunction bond, the voluntary dismissal of the suit by plaintiff has the same effect as a decision of the court that the injunction was improperly sued out.

5. In an action on an injunction bond defendants cannot escape liability on the ground that the writ of injunction was ambiguous, and should not have been obeyed, as they are in no position to make such an objection.

6. A demurrer to a complaint containing two counts cannot be sustained if either count is good.

7. A joint demurrer by several defendants must be overruled if the complaint is good as to either of them.

8. A complaint is not necessarily defective in which there is united with some defendants another against whom no liability is shown, and an order overruling a demurrer for misjoinder of parties is not reversible error if the rights of the parties have not been prejudiced.

9. The fact that the court excused a juror is no ground for reversal where no exception was taken by appellants to the jurors who tried the case, and it does not appear that they did not have an opportunity to exercise all the peremptory challenges allowed them.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by Joseph Asevado and others against Thomas Orr and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed in part.

Warren & Taylor and T. M. Osmont, for appellants. Gillis & Tapscott, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The appellant Thomas Orr brought an action in June, 1891, against the respondents in the superior court of Siskiyou county to restrain them from depositing any sand or gravel in North Fork Cornish ditch, and from diverting the waters of Main Greenhorn creek from said ditch during a certain portion of each day; and immediately after the commencement of the action procured a writ of injunction to issue out of the court, which was served on the plaintiffs herein, restraining them pending the litigation from doing the acts complained of. For the purpose of procuring the issuance of the injunction the plaintiff, in accordance with the order of the judge therefor, filed an undertaking in the amount of $500, executed by the other appellants herein, conditioned "that, in case the said injunction should issue, the said plaintiff, Thomas Orr, would pay the defendants in the said action such damages, not exceeding the sum of $500, as the defendants therein might sustain by reason of the said injunction, if the said superior court should finally decide that the said plaintiff, Thomas Orr, was not entitled thereto." In December, 1891, the action was dismissed upon motion of the plaintiff's counsel, and thereafter the respondents herein brought this action against Orr and the sureties on the undertaking to recover the damages sustained by reason of the injunction. The complaint contains two counts,—one against Orr, claiming the sum of $6,150 for damages resulting from the issuance of the injunction; and the other against the sureties upon their undertaking to respond in the sum of $500 for the amount of such damages. The defendants jointly demurred to the complaint, and, their demurrer having been overruled, they answered the complaint, and a trial was thereafter had in which the jury found that the plaintiffs had suffered damages in the sum of $750. Judgment for that amount was entered against the appellant Orr, and for $500 against the other appellants. From this judgment the defendants have appealed.

1. In Robinson v. Kellum, 6 Cal. 399, an action was brought against the defendant to recover damages for wrongfully suing out an injunction against the plaintiff, and upon the appeal from the judgment rendered therein in favor of the plaintiff the court said: "An action on the case will not lie for improperly suing out an injunction, unless it is charged in the declaration as an abuse of the process of the court through malice and without probable cause. If the act complained of is destitute of these ingredients, then the only remedy of the injured party is an action upon the injunction bond, which is specially provided by the statute as a protection against injury, even without malice;" and reversed the judgment because the complaint failed to aver those facts. To the same effect are the following authorities: Cox v. Taylor, 10 B. Mon. 17; Manlove v. Vick, 55 Miss. 567; Burnett v. Nicholson, 79 N. C. 548; Hayden v. Keith, 32 Minn. 277, 20 N. W. Rep. 195; Lawton v. Green, 64 N. Y. 330; High, Inj. § 1648. The courts of the state are open to every citizen for the redress of his wrongs, and unless he is at liberty to seek such redress without rendering himself liable in damages to the defendant in case he shall fail to establish his complaint, this right would in many instances be a barren privilege. The law has provided that in certain classes of actions a defendant may be restrained during the pendency of the action from enjoying property, or exercising dominion over the same, where his right to the property or of dominion is controverted by the plaintiff; and in such cases the plaintiff is required to indemnify the defendant against any injury that he may sustain from such restraint if it shall be finally determined that the plaintiff did not have a cause of action. The amount of this undertaking is fixed by the court as the measure of damage to be sustained, and is the limit of the defendant's right of recovery. It is to be assumed that the court has properly exercised its discretion in determining this amount; but if, at any time pending the litigation, it should be made to appear to the court that the undertaking is insufficient, it would have the power, and it would be its duty, to require an increase of the undertaking as the condition of allowing the plaintiff to continue the injunction. It is only when the process of the court is abused, or when the plaintiff seeks to avail himself of its power to harass or injure another by suing him upon a charge in which he is conscious of having no right of action, that he becomes amenable in damages for bringing such suit. Such an action is, however, in the nature of a malicious prosecution, and in any action to recover damages therefor want of probable cause and malice are essential ingredients to the complaint, and must be clearly alleged and proved in order to sustain the action. Cox v. Taylor, supra. The complaint in the present case does not aver either malice or want of probable cause, and therefore fails to show any cause of action against the defendant Orr. The contention on the part of the respondents that the voluntary dismissal of the action was an admission by the plaintiff that he had no probable cause for commencing it, is not tenable. The plaintiff may have commenced the action in good faith, and, in the absence of any averment to the contrary, it must be so assumed; but if, after its commencement, he had become satisfied that he would not be able to establish his allegations, either by reason of having been originally misinformed, or because he was unable to procure witnesses in support thereof, good faith towards the defendants would prompt him to dismiss the action, rather than to force them to the annoyance and trouble of contesting his claims at a trial. It is not alleged that the appellant Orr was a party to the undertaking filed by him upon the issuance of the writ of injunction, and consequently he is not liable thereon. Lindsay v. Flint, 4 Cal. 89; Ghiradelli v. Bourland, 32 Cal. 588. It follows that the complaint fails to state any cause of action against Orr, and that the judgment rendered against him was without authority, and must be reversed.

2. The appellants Bohnert and Walbridge agreed by their undertaking that they would pay to the plaintiffs herein any damages which they might sustain by reason of the issuance of the injunction. Their liability depends simply upon proof that the injunction was issued, that the defendants suffered damages thereby, and that the court has decided that the plaintiff was not entitled to the injunction. The voluntary dismissal of the action by the plaintiff had the same effect as a decision of the court that he was not entitled to the injunction, (Dowling v. Polack, 18 Cal. 625;) and the evidence before the jury was sufficient to justify its verdict for the amount in which it was rendered. These appellants, however, urge that their demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. They united with Orr in a general demurrer to the complaint upon the grounds that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant; and that several causes of action were improperly united, viz. an action on the case for damages, and an action upon a special contract. The demurrer upon the two latter grounds is in reality but one, as the specification for misjoinder of parties states as its ground the joining of an action against Orr for damages with an action against these appellants upon their bond; but, assuming the demurrer to be sufficient in form, we think it was properly overruled. The second count in the complaint sufficiently states a cause of action against these appellants upon their undertaking, and a demurrer to the entire complaint cannot be sustained if either of the counts is good. So, also, a joint demurrer by all of the defendants must be overruled if the complaint is good against either of them. A complaint is not necessarily defective in which there is united with some defendants another against whom no liability is alleged or recovery sought, and an order overruling a demurrer for misjoinder of parties defendant does not constitute a reversible error if it can be seen that the rights of the parties have not been prejudiced. The complaint in the present case seeks no recovery against these appellants except upon their undertaking, and it is evident that their rights could not be prejudicially affected by the fact that their principal, who did not unite with them in the undertaking, has been made a codefendant. The repetition in the second count of the complaint of the matters set forth in the first count, and which affect Orr alone, may be regarded as merely surplusage, and, as these matters are insufficient to constitute a cause of action against Orr, they could not have injured the appellants. In Stark v. Wellman, 96 Cal. 400, 31 Pac. Rep. 259, the two causes of action which the plaintiff had united in his complaint were against the same defendant, and it was held that the statute gave him the right to object to their being so united. In the present case, however, the cause of action alleged against Orr is different from the cause of action alleged against these appellants; and, where the substantial rights of the parties have not been affected by a misjoinder of causes of action, a judgment that is rendered after a trial of the case upon its merits should not be reversed because the court overruled a demurrer for such misjoinder. Reynolds v. Lincoln, 71 Cal. 183, 9 Pac. Rep. 176, and 12 Pac. Rep. 449.

The action of the court in excusing the juror De Witt did not give to the defendants an available exception. Assuming that he was competent to be a juror in the case, it does not appear that the defendants were prejudiced by his exclusion. Their right to have the cause tried by an impartial jury did not give them the right to have it tried by any particular jurors. No exception was taken by them to any of the jurors who tried the cause, and it does not appear that they did not have an opportunity to exercise all the peremptory challenges allowed them.

The court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury that the writ of injunction was void by reason of its ambiguity, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs were not entitled to damages because of their obedience to it. They were bound to obey the spirit as well as the letter of the injunction, and were justified in acting so as not to render themselves liable for a contempt in disregarding it on the ground that it was ambiguous. It does not lie in the mouth of one who has secured an injunction which is ambiguous in its terms to object to its obedience on the part of the defendants, or to their claim for recompense for the damage they have sustained thereby.

The appellant Orr obtained the writ, served it upon them, and must be deemed to have intended a compliance with its terms on their part in some form. If they have done so, and have suffered damage, it is not for him to say that they misconceived the terms which he caused to be incorporated therein. Webb v. Laird, (Vt.) 20 Atl. Rep. 599. His acquiescence in their obedience must be accepted as his own construction of the manner in which he intended it to be obeyed, and his bondsmen are liable upon their undertaking for the damages consequent thereon. The judgment against the appellant Orr is reversed, and the judgment against the appellants Bohnert and Walbridge, and the order denying a new trial, are affirmed.

APPEAL—NOTICE—BOND.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 1046, declaring a notice without the title of the action or proceeding in which it is made, or with a defective title, as valid and effectual as if duly entitled, if it intelligently refers to the action or proceeding, a notice of appeal, in which a mistake is made in the first name of respondent in the title of the action, is sufficient where it is duly entitled as to the court and the department in which the action was tried, and intelligently refers to the number of the cause, and to the judgment and order appealed from.

2. Where the undertaking on appeal names the court, and the department thereof, in which the action was tried, gives the number of the cause, and accurately describes the judgment and order appealed from, but contains a mistake in the first name of respondent in the title of the cause, a justice of the supreme court may, under Code Civil Proc. § 954, allow a new undertaking to be filed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; C. W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Hannah Butler against Thomas Ashworth and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Respondent moved to strike the transcript from the files and to dismiss the appeal. Motions denied.

Humphrey & Welch, (W. C. Burnette, of counsel,) for appellants. Geo. B. Merrill, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. Respondent has moved to dismiss the appeal herein, and to strike from the files the transcript on appeal. In preparing his notice of appeal, counsel for the appellant entitled the cause "Emma Butler vs. Thomas Ashworth et al.," and it is claimed that this invalidates the appeal. An affidavit has been filed in which counsel for appellant states that the mistake was caused by the fact that when he was employed in the case he placed his private papers for use therein in an envelope, and indorsed the same with the title of the action, but in doing so, through inadvertence and mistake, wrote the plaintiff's name therein as Emma Butler, and, in preparing the notice of appeal and other papers in which the mistake as to plaintiff's name occurred, he wrote the same from the title of the cause as the same appeared upon said envelope, and never discovered the mistake until he was preparing the transcript to be used on appeal herein. Section 1046, Code Civil Proc., provides that "an affidavit, notice, or other paper, without the title of the action or proceeding, in which it is made, or with a defective title, is as valid and effectual for any purpose as if duly entitled, if it intelligently refer to such action or proceeding." The notice in question is duly entitled as to the court, and the department thereof in which the action was tried, and intelligibly refers to the number of the cause, and to the judgment and order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial. In preparing the undertaking on appeal, counsel for appellant made the same mistake, but as the undertaking names the court and department thereof, gives the number of the cause, and accurately describes the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial, we think, if the defect is a material one, the case comes within the provisions of section 954, Code Civil Proc., which authorizes the filing of a new undertaking, approved by a justice of the supreme court. A request to file such undertaking was made at the hearing, and granted. The motion to strike the transcript from the files is denied. The motion to dismiss the appeal is also denied, an undertaking approved by the chief justice of this court having been filed herein.

CITIES—CONTRACTS—STREET LIGHTING.

The lighting of streets by electric arc lights placed above the intersections of streets is not "street work," within Mun. Corp. Act, § 777, as amended by St. 1891, p. 54, providing that in the erection of public buildings, and in all street and sewer work, it shall be done by contract let after notice by publication.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; George E. Otis, Judge.

Action by the Electric Light & Power Company against the city of San Bernardino. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Harris & Gregg, for appellant. Wm. Gird and John Brown, Jr., for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The plaintiff in this case is the Electric Light & Power Company, a corporation organized in this state, and the defendant is the city of San Bernardino, a municipal corporation of the fifth class. The plaintiff entered into an express contract for lighting the streets of the city of San Bernardino for one year following the 1st day of October, 1891, with 42 electric lamps. The city agreed to pay therefor the sum of $546 per month. The contract was fully complied with on the part of the plaintiff, and the defendant made payments on the contract for all the months except July, August, and September, 1892. The respondent refused to pay for lighting the city during these last-named months, and this action is brought to recover the contract price, amounting to $1,638. In answer to plaintiff's complaint, the defendant alleges that the lighting of the city was done under the contract set forth, but asserts that the contract was unauthorized, in that it was not let pursuant to any notice or advertisement for bids for lighting the city, and that no advertisement inviting bids for the lighting of the city was ever given by the board of trustees of said city. At the close of plaintiff's case, the defendant moved for judgment of nonsuit on the grounds specified in his answer, and the court granted the motion, and ordered judgment for defendant. This appeal is prosecuted from such judgment.

The merits of this appeal are determined by the construction given section 777 of the municipal corporation act, as amended by the Statutes of 1891, p. 54. That portion of the section to which it is necessary that we direct our attention is as follows: "In the erection, improvement and repair of all public buildings and works, in all street and sewer work, and in all work in or about streams, bays or water-fronts, or in or about embankments or other works for protection against overflow, and in furnishing any supplies or materials for the same, when the expenditure required for the same exceeds the sum of $100, the same shall be done by contract, and shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder after notice by publication in a newspaper of general circulation. * * *". The city was lighted by plaintiff, as shown by the testimony, by arc electric lights suspended at a considerable height above the intersection of the streets, from wires, which wires were supported by wooden masts. Does the lighting of streets, as here described, come within the term "street work," as used in the foregoing provision of the statute? We are satisfied that it does not, and to give such a meaning would demand a construction of the statute entirely unjustifiable by its language. "Street work" is a phrase of common usage, and has a well-defined signification. The words mean exactly what they indicate upon their face, namely, work upon a street,—work in repairing or making a street. The phrase is found in the decisions of this court, and in the statutes of the state, times without number, and its construction as indicated, to our knowledge, has never been questioned. The parties plaintiff and defendant entered into an express contract. The plaintiff furnished the light at the time and upon the terms demanded by the contract, and the city now refuses to pay the balance due under its contract, upon the ground that notice was not given in the newspapers and bids requested. Such being the status of the case, it certainly is not demanded of us that doubtful constructions, even if this provision gave occasion for them, should be resolved in favor of the defendant. The provision, fairly construed by all rules of construction, does not bring the subject of this litigation within the term "street work," as there used. There can be no question as to the sound policy of a law requiring municipal corporations to enter into contracts for the payment of money only after full notice and opportunity for competition, but that is not a matter for our consideration here. We must take the statute as we find it. We can neither add to it nor subtract from it. It is our duty alone to construe it as it stands enacted. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment for the plaintiff upon the pleadings.

WAGNER v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (No. 15,506.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 25, 1893.)

On rehearing. Petition denied.

For report of decision on appeal, see 34 Pac. 648.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a rehearing will be denied. It appears that on September 28, 1892, the petitioner, L. M. Wagner, was adjudged insolvent by the superior court of Los Angeles, and subsequently the court, in the matter of the insolvency proceeding, made a distribution of all of the estate of the insolvent which had come into the possession of the assignee, and granted to the petitioner here a certificate of discharge of all debts and claims existing against her at the date of the filing of her petition to be adjudged insolvent, and also made an order discharging the assignee, which latter order was subsequently vacated. When the order was made granting to the petitioner here a certificate of discharge, the insolvency proceeding was ended as to her, and the court had no further jurisdiction over the person of the insolvent; and its jurisdiction could only be restored by an application upon the part of some creditor to set aside and annul the decree or certificate discharging her from her indebtedness, as provided by section 53 of the insolvent act. It seems, however, that since the making of the orders referred to two petitions have been filed in the superior court, each praying that the certificate of discharge granted to the petitioner herein be annulled upon the ground of alleged fraud in obtaining it. One of these petitions was filed by the assignee in the insolvency proceeding, and the other by a creditor of the insolvent, Wagner. The court thereupon made an order requiring the petitioner herein to appear on October 30, 1893, and show cause why the order discharging her from her indebtedness should not be vacated; and upon the same day, upon further petition of the assignee, the court made an order requiring the petitioner to appear before the court upon September 19, 1893, for examination in relation to her property; and also directed that subpoenas should issue, requiring the attendance as witnesses of other persons claiming to own such property. This latter petition and order seems to be based upon section 47 of the insolvent act, and the object of this proceeding is to prohibit the court from proceeding under this latter order. We think the application must be granted. After the final discharge of the petitioner in the insolvency proceeding, the court was without authority to proceed under section 47 of the insolvent act and examine the petitioner here for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not all the property of the insolvent estate had come into the hands of the assignee, or to examine any other person against whom no citation had been issued under section 24 of the insolvent act. We think this conclusion is sustained by the reasoning of Woodruff, J., in Re Dole, 9 N. B. R. 193, and also by the case of In re Witkowski, 10 N. B. R. 209. Our former judgment in this case as actually entered by the clerk, and the writ issued in pursuance thereof, were not in exact accordance with the opinion filed, and the judgment is amended by striking therefrom all that part which prohibits the superior court from requiring the said L. M. Wagner to show cause why the order of discharge theretofore granted to her should not be vacated, annulled, and set aside; and the writ of prohibition will be amended in the same particulars. The prohibition only extends to proceeding further under the order of September 1, 1893, requiring the said Wagner to appear in the superior court on September 19, 1893, and submit to an examination relating to her property, and which also directed subpoenas to issue requiring the attendance of certain persons therein named as witnesses.

BEATTY, C. J., (dissenting.) The filing of a new opinion by the court denying a rehearing of this cause presents a proper occasion for me to state the grounds of my dissent from the judgment and from the present order. In this new opinion the facts which I deem most material to the discussion, although correctly stated, are somewhat obscured by the more particular statement of facts which, to my mind, are wholly immaterial. I shall therefore endeavor to state the case—which is very simple—in a manner which will clearly present the single question we are called upon to decide.

L. M. Wagner was adjudicated an insolvent on her voluntary petition. Hall was appointed assignee. In the usual course of proceedings, Wagner, the insolvent, received her certificate of discharge from the claims of creditors, and a few months later the final account of Hall, the assignee, was settled, and he was discharged. Shortly afterwards, Hall and a creditor of the insolvent filed separate petitions on the same day, each alleging fraud on the part of the insolvent in concealing her property, and preventing it from reaching the hands of her assignee. In the creditor's petition he prayed for an order setting aside the insolvent's certificate of discharge. That is a proceeding now pending in the superior court, with which we have nothing to do in this case. The petition of the assignee prayed for an order vacating and annulling the order by which he had been discharged, and also prayed for an order setting aside the insolvent's certificate of discharge. This latter order, it is conceded, the assignee had no right to ask; but the fact that he asked for an order to which he was not entitled was no reason for refusing to vacate the order by which he had been discharged, and accordingly the court made such an order, as it had the undoubted right to do, and the effect was to put the insolvency proceeding in the same condition in which it was before the assignee was discharged. Rued v. Cooper, 34 Pac. 98, (decided here August 31, 1893.) No one now questions the validity or effect of that order, and it also, like the proceeding by the creditor above mentioned, may be dismissed from further consideration. Here, then, was the simple and ordinary case of an insolvency proceeding, in which the insolvent debtor has been discharged from the claims of creditors, but the assignee is still actively engaged in the execution of his trust,—collecting the insolvent's estate for the purpose of distribution to the creditors. This being the condition of affairs, Hall, the assignee, filed a separate and distinct petition in the superior court having jurisdiction of the insolvency proceeding, alleging that the insolvent had concealed a portion of the property covered by her assignment to him, and praying for an order to her to come into court and submit to an examination touching the matter so alleged. Upon the filing of this petition the superior court made the order prayed for, and this is the order which we are here asked to prohibit the superior court from proceeding under.

The only question to be decided, therefore, is whether a superior court, in which an insolvency proceeding is regularly pending, has the power, on petition of the assignee, after the discharge of the insolvent debtor, to cite and examine the insolvent under section 24 of the insolvent law. The court, in its last opinion, says that this latter petition and order "seems to be based upon section 47 of the insolvent act." I cannot see why this should be said. Neither the petition nor the order refers to any particular section of any act. The petition states facts which bring the case within section 24, and counsel, in their argument, rely upon section 24. If this were not enough to give them the benefit of the provisions of that section, it might be suggested that the respect due to the orders and proceedings of the superior courts, and the presumptions in favor of their validity, should prevent us from holding such orders void if there is any law anywhere in the statutes which will sustain them; and even if counsel had relied exclusively upon section 47,—as they have not,—the action of the court should be sustained if it is fully warranted by section 24. Section 24 of the insolvency act gives to assignees in insolvency the right to take the same proceedings by "citation, examination," etc., against "persons suspected of having concealed or embezzled, conveyed away or disposed of any property of the debtor," which are authorized by sections 1459-1461, Code Civil Proc., on the part of administrators or executors against persons suspected of having concealed or embezzled property of decedents. It does not confer a special jurisdiction over the insolvent debtor, as is done by section 47 of the insolvency act, and by section 26 of the national bankruptcy act, but a general jurisdiction over all persons suspected of concealing or embezzling any portion of the property assigned. Conceding that by the discharge of the insolvent the court has lost the special jurisdiction over him conferred by section 47 and other provisions of the act, it does not follow that it has lost the general jurisdiction over all persons suspected, etc., conferred by section 24. Indeed, I suppose no one would contend that the court by the discharge of the debtor loses jurisdiction to cite and examine other suspected persons on petition of the assignee; and, if the court has this jurisdiction over the rest of mankind, I cannot see any reason why the insolvent himself should be exempt from it. He has the same inducement to conceal and embezzle the property that others have, and, as a general thing, much better opportunities. The provision is remedial, salutary, summary, and inexpensive, and if any one has less reason than another to complain of its application it is the insolvent, who is availing himself of the benefits of the law. If he is innocent, the examination cannot hurt him; if he is guilty, it is right that he should be compelled to divulge the facts. The conclusion of the court that he alone is exempt from a process to which all the world is subject cannot be sustained unless the discharge of the insolvent is held to operate as a license to him to embezzle the estate which he has assigned with a degree of impunity not enjoyed by any other person. But clearly his discharge has no such effect. Its whole scope is to release him from claims of creditors, and even as to them it is void if it has been obtained by fraud, and they may attack it directly or collaterally. As to the assignee and his claim to the property assigned, it has no effect. If he finds that the debtor has in his hands property covered by the assignment, whether concealed or embezzled before or after his discharge, it is the right and the imperative duty of the assignee to endeavor to recover it for the benefit of the creditors; and to this end he has, and ought to have, free recourse to all the remedies, direct and auxiliary, which the statute has provided.

The cases cited from the N. B. R. in the opinion of the court are not authority for its conclusion, for two reasons. In the first place, the rulings in the different circuit courts on this point are not uniform. See decision of Judge Blatchford, contra, in Re Heath, 7 N. B. R. 448. But more important than this is the fact that the national bank ruptcy act contains no provision equivalent to section 24 of our insolvency law, giving a general jurisdiction over all persons "suspected," etc., to cite and examine them. The only provisions of that act applicable to a proceeding like that in question here are contained in section 26, and they apply to the bankrupt alone. In other words, they confer a special summary jurisdiction over him, which, as was held by the circuit court in the cases referred to, ends with his discharge. But this conclusion was based upon a construction of various clauses of section 26, no equivalent of which is to be found in any part of our insolvency law.

It is further to be observed that the argument in favor of this construction, so far as it is based upon the terms of the law, was not wholly satisfactory to the author of the opinion, for he seems to have considered it necessary to reinforce it by an additional argument founded upon the great hardship of holding to a construction that would expose the bankrupt during the remainder of his life to oppressive and vexatious proceedings on the part of his assignee. It is this part of the argument alone which is applicable to the present proceeding, and to my mind it is entitled to very little weight. To hold that an action or special proceeding capable of being used oppressively or vexatiously ought not to exist, would lead logically to the abolition of all legal remedies. There is no man living who is not continually exposed to the danger, such as it is, of malicious prosecutions, civil and criminal; that is to say, it is in the power of any maliciously disposed person to put him upon his defense on a trumped-up charge. But this has never been deemed a sufficient ground for depriving individuals of the right to institute actions on their mere volition; and their liberty to do so has not resulted in any great hardship, for the very sufficient reason that few persons care to incur the trouble and cost of commencing a litigation in which they are sure to be defeated, and for which, if they have proceeded wantonly or maliciously and without probable cause, they are liable to an action for damages. I think the fear that this particular process might be employed to oppress unfortunate debtors is purely visionary; and, even if there were anything in reason or experience to justify it, I repeat that I cannot see why, when the rest of mankind is subject to it, the one person who has sought the benefits of the law should be alone exempt.

McCLURE v. McCLURE. (No. 15,188.)

MORTGAGES—CONSIDERATION—SUFFICIENCY.

The compromise by a wife of a suit for divorce against her husband, and her abandonment of her alleged right of homestead in his property, is a valid consideration for a mortgage executed by the husband in her favor to secure a note.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Lake county; R. McGarvey, Judge.

Action by Frank McClure against N. H. McClure. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hudson & Sayre, for appellant. Thomas B. Bond and Woods Crawford, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, O. Action to foreclose a mortgage executed by defendant to secure his promissory note for $2,000, made to his wife, Mrs. M. E. McClure, and by her assigned to the plaintiff, who is the son of defendant and his said wife. The only defense upon which any point is made here is that there was no consideration for the note or mortgage. The judgment was in favor of the plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is contended by counsel for appellant that the evidence does not justify the finding by the court that there was "a valuable and adequate consideration" for the execution of the note and mortgage. The making of the note and mortgage was one of the results of a compromise of pending lawsuits between defendant and his wife. On April 5, 1887, defendant and wife, with minor children, were residing on the mortgaged premises, which were then community property of the husband and wife, but had not been selected or recorded as a homestead by either. On that day, on account of some difference between them, the defendant angrily ordered his wife to leave their home. Thereupon they divided their household furniture and provisions of food, and she left her house, and went to a house which she leased, about a mile from the mortgaged premises, saying then, and often afterwards, that she intended never to return to or to live with her husband; and she never did. About three weeks after thus leaving, she made and filed her declaration of homestead on the mortgaged premises, containing, among other things, the following: "I do now, at the time of making this declaration, actually reside with my husband and family on the land, but am temporarily abiding off said land and premises." On October 15, 1887, the defendant commenced an action against his wife to quiet his title against her claim of homestead, and to annul her recorded declaration thereof, as a cloud upon his title, on the ground that she was not residing on the land at the time said declaration was made and recorded. On July 3, 1888, the defendant commenced another action against his wife for a divorce on the alleged ground of her willful desertion. To this complaint she answered, denying that she had willfully deserted, etc., and also filed a cross complaint, praying for a divorce from her husband, but upon what ground does not appear. On December 19, 1888, the divorce case was called for trial, when the attorney for the plaintiff therein asked for a recess for the purpose of effecting a compromise of the matters of difference between the parties, which was granted. During the recess the terms of a compromise of the action and cross action for divorce and the action to annul the declaration of homestead were agreed upon, and were entered in the minutes of the court in connection with the dismissal of those actions as follows: "The plaintiff appearing in person and by J. M. Hamilton, Esq., and C. F. Fishback and S. K. Welch, Esq., and defendant appearing in person and by R. W. Crump, her counsel, and on motion of counsel for plaintiff the action of N. H. McClure v. M. E. McClure is dismissed, and the cross complaint of the defendant herein in this action is, on motion of counsel for defendant, dismissed, and the action N. H. McClure v. M. E. McClure, to quiet title to real estate, is, by consent of counsel, dismissed; each party in each case to pay his own costs, respectively. It is agreed between the parties that N. H. McClure shall execute to M. E. McClure a note for $2,000.00, due one year from January 1, 1887, with interest at 10 per cent., secured by mortgage on the property claimed in this action to be community property, situate near Upper Lake, in this county. M. E. McClure agrees to convey to N. H. McClure all her right, title, and interest in and to said property claimed to be community property, and to relinquish the homestead filed thereon by her, and to assign the policy of life insurance taken out by N. H. McClure for her benefit to the said N. H. McClure, free from all claims or demands against him whatsoever, of record or otherwise. Both parties agree that each will convey to the other by quitclaim deed his interest or pretended interest in the property of the other in the state of Missouri."

The defendant testified that he agreed to this compromise reluctantly, but was induced to do so by the advice of his attorneys. Mr. Crump, the attorney for the wife in the divorce suit, testified that Mr. Fishback, attorney for the husband in that suit, drew all the papers relating to the compromise in such form as he desired, and that he thinks they were all executed at the time the note and mortgage were executed; and there is no evidence to the contrary. Nor is there any evidence that the wife had not fully performed her part of the compromise agreement before this action was commenced, though it is contended that the mode adopted by Mr. Fishback to divest her of her alleged homestead right was not effectual. The mode adopted was a conveyance by the wife to the husband of all her rights and interest in the community property, including the homestead. It is claimed that her homestead right (if she had any such right) could have been divested or abandoned only by the joint act of herself and husband in the mode provided by sections 1243 and 1244 of the Civil Code, and upon this alone depends defendant's contention that there was no consideration for the note and mortgage. It is unnecessary to determine what was the effect of the wife's declaration of homestead, made and recorded under the circumstances above stated; nor is it necessary to determine what effect her conveyance to her husband of all her right to community property had upon her disputed right to a homestead. It is not questioned, nor is it questionable, that the compromise agreement was a sufficient consideration for the note and mortgage while it remained unrescinded, and after its terms had been performed on the part of the wife in the mode dictated by the husband through his learned attorneys, it not appearing that she was ever requested to perform, or refused to perform, in any other mode. Besides, she could not have abandoned the homestead in the mode prescribed by the Code without the concurrent abandonment thereof by her husband; nor, if the agreement required her to abandon in that mode, could she have been put in default without the offer of the husband to join her in the act. While the compromise agreement subsisted as a valid contract, it remained a valid consideration for the note and mortgage, whether fully performed by the wife or not. Dr. Wharton, in his work on Contracts, (section 533,) says: "As has been incidentally noticed, a promise to compromise a claim utterly unfounded will not be regarded as a valid consideration. * * * It is otherwise when a suit is brought bona fide on probable cause; and a promise to compromise such suit is a valid consideration, even though the suit should be held to be unfounded. Were it otherwise, there could be no compromise of litigation, since there is no litigation in which one or the other party, if the case be pressed to judgment, does not fail to make out his case. Not only will such agreements, when there is no fraud, be sustained by the courts, but they are highly favored as productive of peace and good will in the community, and reducing the expense and persistency of litigation. The rule is peculiarly applicable in family settlements, where right and wrong on both sides are so often dependent on feeling; in which cases the courts, unless there be an imposition, will not undertake to weigh actual gain or loss." In this case there is no pretense of fraud or imposition, nor is it pretended that the compromised suits were not brought and defended bona fide. It is further to be observed that Mrs. McClure died on January 31, 1890, two days after having assigned the note and mortgage to the plaintiff, who had assisted in supporting her after her separation from her husband. It would seem that her death, under the circumstances, relieved defendant's title from any cloud caused by her declaration of homestead, though this question is not necessarily involved, and need not be decided. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. NICOLosi. (No. 21,018.)

LARCENY—POSSESSION OF STOLEN PROPERTY—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A trunk alleged to have been stolen by defendant was found in a shanty which had been occupied by defendant and another for several weeks. The officer searching for it found it, with another trunk, under defendant's bed, covered over with old clothing; and defendant, when asked what it was, replied that it was nothing. When ordered to open it, he said he did not have the key, but when the trunk was examined the lock was found to be broken, and a letter was found in it, addressed to defendant's brother. Being asked whose name it was, and how it came there, defendant said it was his name, and that he put the letter in the trunk himself. Defendant said that the trunk had been left there two weeks before by a man whom he did not know, and who promised to pay him for keeping it. It was shown that the trunk had been stolen about two weeks before it was found in defendant's possession. Held sufficient to warrant a finding that defendant stole the trunk.

2. As the evidence clearly proved that the trunk was found either in the sole possession of defendant, or the joint possession of defendant and the person occupying the room with him, the court properly refused to charge that if the trunk was only found in a house which defendant occupied jointly with another, equally capable of having committed the theft, then no definite presumption of guilt could be made, the instruction not being applicable to the facts.

3. It was not error for the court to permit a witness to describe the trunk found with the one that had been stolen, such evidence not being given to show that such trunk had been stolen or lost.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; George E. Otis, Judge.

Jaratarno Nicolosi was convicted of larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

E. R. Annable and Paris & Allison, for appellant. Frank F. Oster, Dist. Atty., for the People.

VANCLIEF, C. The defendant and Giovanni Lena were, by information, jointly accused of the crime of grand larceny, committed by feloniously stealing and carrying away a trunk and contents thereof consisting of ladies' apparel, the property of a Miss Jennie Fetty. On a separate trial the defendant was found guilty, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state's prison; and he brings this appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. Counsel for appellant contend that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, in that there was no evidence tending to prove the defendant guilty, except proof that the stolen property was found in his possession. But I think there was other evidence sufficiently corroborative of the inference from possession of the stolen property to justify the verdict. The trunk was found in the possession of defendant and Lena, in a small rought, 10x14 board shanty, in which they had been living only about four weeks, in the town of Riverside, San Bernardino county, by J. W. Dickson, the marshal, and F. P. Wilson, constable, of that town. The shanty had but one window, and that was darkened by boards nailed on the inside, and a gunny sack on the outside. The marshal, while searching for the drunk in the shanty, and in the presence of defendant and Lena, discovered something under their bed or bunk covered with a quilt, gum coat, and other old clothing, and asked defendant what it was. Defendant answered, "Oh, nothing." The marshal then pulled off the covering, and discovered two trunks, one of which was Miss Fetty's trunk, and ordered defendant to open it. Defendant said: "It ain't my trunk. I cannot open it up. I haven't got any key to the trunk." Upon examination, the marshal discovered that the lock had been broken, and he opened the trunk, and found therein an envelope addressed as follows: "Mr. L. Nicolosi, No. 105 Upper Main St., Los Angeles, Calif." Being asked whose name that was, and how it came there, defendant said: "That is my name. I wrote it and put it there two or three days ago." Being reminded that he had said he could not open the trunk, and asked to explain, he said nothing. The address on the envelope was that of his brother. Defendant further told the marshal that the trunks were brought there about two weeks before by a man who drove up with a light spring wagon and a gray horse, whom he had never seen before nor since, and who told defendant that he (the stranger) would like to leave those trunks there for a few days, and that he would call for them, and pay for the trouble of keeping them; and thereupon he (defendant) and his partner (Lena) carried the trunks into their cabin. Defendant also said he had not been doing anything since he came to Riverside; that he had come up from Los Angeles to pick oranges. It was proved that Miss Fetty's trunk had been stolen about two weeks before it was found in the possession of defendant and Lena. These circumstances of themselves were sufficient to excite a very strong suspicion of defendant's guilt, even though it had not been known that Miss Fetty or any other person had lost a trunk, and together with the proof that the trunk had been stolen, and found in the possession of the defendant, justified the verdict of the jury. People v. Chambers, 18 Cal. 383; People v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 457.

2. The defendant asked the court to instruct the jury that if the trunk was "only found lying in a house or room in which he (defendant) lived jointly with another equally capable of having committed the theft, then no definite presumption of guilt could be made." Had the evidence tended to prove only that the trunk was found in a room occupied by defendant and Lena, without showing any connection or relation between them, or how the trunk came there, perhaps it would have been insufficient to prove possession of the trunk by the defendant, individually or jointly with Lena, in which case the instruction asked might have been proper. But the evidence is clear, and without conflict, that the trunk was found either solely in possession of defendant, or in the joint possession of defendant and Lena. This was admitted by the defendant, who testified that he and Lena had voluntarily taken it into their room, and kept it there about two weeks. Therefore, the instruction asked was not applicable to the evidence. It falsely assumed that there was evidence by which the jury might have been justified in finding that the trunk "was only found lying in a house or room" occupied jointly by defendant and another, whereas, it was clearly proved that the trunk was not only thus found, but that it had been taken and kept there by the voluntary assistance of the defendant, and was in his possession.

3. While Dickson was testifying for the people, he spoke of and described the other trunk found with Miss Fetty's trunk under defendant's bed. Defendant's attorney objected to "his saying anything in regard to any other trunk than the one described in the complaint, on the ground that it is irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and having a tendency to prove the commission of another crime." It is contended that the court erred in overruling this objection. No evidence was given or offered tending to prove the other trunk had been stolen or lost. It was merely described as one of the things discovered in close proximity to the stolen trunk, as were the quilt, gum coat, and other old clothes with which the trunks were covered. I think the court did not err in permitting a mere description of all things found with the stolen trunk under the defendant's bed. I think the order and judgment should be affirmed.

In re WERINGER'S ESTATE. (No. 19,184.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE — PROVISIONS FOR WIFE — MEDICAL ATTENDANCE—FUNERAL EXPENSES AND MONUMENT—ADMINISTRATOR'S ACCOUNT.

1. A husband who has means being declared liable by Civil Code, § 174, for his wife's support, her estate should not be charged with the expense of doctors, nurses, and medicines obtained by him for her in her last illness.

2. Error in allowing an item in an administrator's account for family allowance will not be presumed, but as, in case the court made an order granting family allowance authorizing payment of the amount named in the account, no voucher would be necessary, one alleging error must show that such order was not made.

3. At common law, a husband was liable for the funeral expenses of his wife.

4. While a husband's duty to give his wife decent burial includes the placing of some mark of identification over her burial place, still if he was poor, and she left a considerable estate, the court might allow a reasonable amount from her estate towards a monument.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. Conklin, Judge.

Accounting by the administrator of Lucy Weringer, deceased. From a decree settling the account, her distributees appeal. Reversed.

Mahon & Laird, for appellants. E. Brundage, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an appeal from a decree settling an annual account of the administrator. Among the items allowed were the following: "Dr. Cook, medical services last illness, $45.50; Dr. Fergusson, same, $10.50; Dr. Rogers, same, $50; Blodget & Dudley, drugs, $18.35; Mary Dougherty, nurse last illness, $25." We think the objections to these items were properly taken by the contestant, and that they were improper.

erly allowed. Section 174, Civil Code; Gerlach v. Terry, 75 Cal. 290, 17 Pac. Rep. 207. The administrator testified as follows: "Before and at the time that my said wife, Lucy Weringer, died, I was engaged in business in Bakersfield, and was handling large sums of money. I also owned considerable valuable real estate and personal property. I called in the doctors to attend to my wife during her last illness. The nurse, Mary Dougherty, I hired to wait upon and care for my wife during her last illness." At common law the husband was bound to bury his deceased wife in a suitable manner, and was bound to defray the necessary funeral expenses. Although the rule is not universal in this country, it prevails in most of the states. Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 199. The duty is one which is involved in the obligation of the husband to maintain the wife while living. He has the control of the body of his deceased wife, and must care for the same, and may select a proper place for the interment, regardless of the wishes of her parents or other relatives. Staples' Appeal, 52 Conn. 426; Smyley v. Reese, 53 Ala. 89.

It is claimed by appellants that the court improperly allowed the item of $2,000 on account of family allowance, but there is nothing in the record upon which such contention can be sustained. The court may have made an order granting family allowance which authorized payment by the administrator of the amount named, and, that being so, no voucher was required. Error must be shown; it cannot be presumed.

The court allowed an item of $670 for "funeral expenses and monument." It does not appear how much of the item was for the monument. Whether or not the administrator ought to have been allowed anything on account of the monument depends upon circumstances. Included in the obligation to give his deceased wife decent burial is the duty of placing some mark of identification over her last resting place. If the husband be poor, and the deceased leave a considerable estate, the former ought not to be expected to contribute much to a monument; and it would be proper in such a case, we think, for the court to fix a reasonable amount to be allowed for that purpose. The amount allowed for the expenses of the funeral and a monument should be governed by the custom of people of like rank and condition in society; a distinction being made in this respect, however, between solvent and insolvent estates. 2 Woerner, Adm'n, § 359. The order is affirmed as to the family allowance, but is reversed as to the other items, and the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to hear the parties further, and determine the matter in accordance with the views herein expressed.

PEOPLE v. WEIGER. (No. 21,007.)
FALSE PRETENSES — INTENT OF DEFENDANT — ADMISSIONS IN CIVIL ACTION.

1. On trial for violation of Pen. Code, § 532, which denounces as a criminal "every person who knowingly and designedly, by false or fraudulent representations, defrauds any other person of property," it is no defense that defendant had no intent to defraud when he obtained goods by false representations, but fully intended to pay for the goods, and felt sure of his ability to do so when the bill would become due.

2. The fact that defendant testified in an insolvency proceeding in obedience to a citation did not deprive him of his right to refuse to answer questions tending to criminate him; and an admission made by him in such proceeding is voluntary, and competent evidence in a criminal prosecution subsequently inaugurated, where he was not in custody, or charged with a criminal offense, when he made such admission.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Charles Weiger was convicted of obtaining goods by false pretenses, and appeals. Affirmed.

Holl & Dunn, for appellant. Frank D. Ryan and Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

The defendant was convicted of the offense of obtaining goods by false and fraudulent pretenses. He was prosecuted under section 532 of the Penal Code, which denounces as criminal "every person who knowingly and designedly, by false or fraudulent representations or pretenses, defrauds any other person of money or property." On the trial, defendant testified in his own behalf to the effect that he had no intention, when he obtained the goods, of defrauding the Sharpless firm; that he fully intended paying for the goods, and felt perfectly sure of his ability to do so, when the bill would become due. The court instructed the jury upon the subject of criminal intent as follows: "The intent necessary to constitute the offense charged in this case is the intent to procure a credit, whereby possession of property was obtained. It is not the intent to pay for such property after having thus procured it. Such intent—the one last mentioned—does not shield the defendant from the consequences of the intent first mentioned. So, if, upon a consideration of all the evidence, you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubts that the defendant intended by the representations which it is admitted he made, and which he admitted he knew were not true, to Sharpless Bros., to obtain the property alleged to have been received by him, and did receive such property, then he is guilty of the offense charged, even though he intended, when he made such representations, to pay for the goods when the bills for them became due. The obtaining of goods by such false representations is fraudulent, and the fraudulent character of such transaction is not changed by the fact that there may have been an intention at the time to pay for the goods. The reason of what I have just stated to you will be apparent to your minds by considering the fact that in very few cases—perhaps in none—could a man be convicted of this act of obtaining money or property under false pretenses, if he could make it apparent that, notwithstanding his obtaining the money or property, he would make it good at some future time by restoring the property or paying the money. I have been thus particular of speaking of the intent here for the reason that I desire that you will not be led into any confusion on that subject; and I repeat that, while it may have been the intention of the defendant to pay for the goods, that intention constitutes no defense, if, at the time when he made the representations, he made them for the purpose of obtaining the goods, or obtaining the credit on which he received the goods." The jury had already been told that to constitute the offense there must exist the intent to defraud; that there must be actual fraud committed, and accomplished by the use of false pretenses, made for the purpose, and the owner must have been induced to part with his property by the fraud. Counsel claims that this instruction is erroneous, and contrary to the statute, which he contends does not denounce as criminal obtaining goods by false pretenses, but simply the act of defrauding another by obtaining goods in that mode; that if defendant obtained the goods with the honest intent of paying for them according to the contract, and believed himself able to do so, he has not defrauded the Sharpless firm, although he obtained the goods by false pretenses. In the assumption that it must be held that defendant did not intend to defraud the Sharpless firm if he intended at the time to pay for the goods according to the contract of sale, and truly believed that he was able to do so, I think counsel is in error. Deception, deliberately practiced, for the purpose of gaining an unfair advantage of another, is fraud. Goods obtained by such practices are obtained by fraud. One deprived of his property by such means is defrauded. By the false pretenses the Sharpless firm was made to believe that defendant had a capital of $12,000 cash, and owed nothing, whereas he had at the most not more than $4,500, and owed $10,000. Relying upon this false statement, they parted with their goods. They were unwilling to do this upon his mere promise to pay, without proof of his ability to do so. His intention to pay, the law presumes from the fact of the purchase. The crime consists in the false statement in regard to ability to do that which the law would compel him to do if he possessed the financial ability. Although sufficiently obvious upon reason, there are abundant authorities for this position. In England the rule was declared in Queen v. Naylor, L. R. 1 Cr. Cas. 4. In that case a special verdict was rendered, in which the jury found, among other facts, that defendant, when he obtained the goods, intended to pay when it should be in his power to do so. The case having been reserved for consideration before the court of crown cases reserved, the opinion was as follows: "We are all of the opinion that this conviction must be affirmed." There was no essential difference in the statutes. The condition of the cases in this country upon this subject is well stated in Buntian v. State, 15 Tex. App. 515, as follows: "Again, it is contended, 'If defendant intended to refund the money and return the pledge at the time he obtained the money, then he is not guilty of swindling,' and that it was error in the charge of the court that the jury was not so instructed. The crime denounced in the statute is the obtaining by false pretenses. As was said in State v. Thatcher, 35 N. J. Law, 445, 'The defendant's ability or his ultimate intention to do what the law would compel him, as the principal debtor, to do, cannot save him.' And the language of the supreme court of Massachusetts is equally explicit: 'The intent to defraud is the intent, by the use of such false means, to induce another to part with his possession, and confide it to defendant, when he would not otherwise have done so. Neither the promise to pay, nor the intention to do so, will deprive the false and fraudulent act in obtaining it of its criminality.' Com. v. Tenney, 97 Mass. 50; Com. v. Mason, 105 Mass. 163. 'The offense is complete when the property or money has been obtained by such means, and would not be purged by subsequent restoration or repayment. Evidence of the ability to make the repayment is therefore immaterial and inadmissible. The possession of the means of payment is entirely consistent with the fraud charged.'" I think, therefore, the court did not err in giving the instruction. In holding this, it is not necessary to agree with the reason given by the learned judge for the rule. That statement could not have injured the defendant. It will follow, also, that defendant's objection to the information cannot be sustained.

Upon the trial the prosecution offered in evidence a copy of a deposition of the defendant in the proceeding in insolvency. It was admitted that defendant had filed his petition in insolvency; that, while such proceedings were pending, defendant was cited to answer concerning his property; and that the deposition offered was the testimony given by him. But defendant objected to it as evidence on the ground that it was incompetent, and that the statements regarded as admissions or confessions were not voluntary. The objection was overruled, and defendant excepted. The deposition was read, and showed by defendant's statements that when he made the representations in question he had only about $3,500, and owed $9,000. This, of course, proved that the representations were false, and that defendant knew it. No case was cited, nor have I found any, in which it has been held that statements made by a witness in a civil case, when the witness is not in custody, and has not been charged with a criminal offense, voluntarily given, are not competent evidence against him in a prosecution subsequently inaugurated; and the statements are voluntary if he might have objected to answering on the ground that it would criminate him, and failed to do so. 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 1255, lays down the rule thus: "The answers and other testimony which are voluntarily given as a witness in any case or proceeding, civil or criminal, as before a commissioner in bankruptcy, a committee of the legislature, a committing magistrate, a grand jury, a coroner, a fire inquest, or any court in an ordinary lawsuit, are, as admissions or confessions, competent against him on any issue in a criminal case to which they are pertinent." See, also, 1 Greenl. Ev. § 225. The question has been discussed in numerous cases, and the rule seems clearly established, as stated in Hendrickson v. People, 10 N. Y. 13, "that where a witness answers questions upon examination upon a trial tending to criminate himself, and to which he might have demurred, his answers may be used for all purposes." 2 Starkie, Ev. 50; Rosc. Crim. Ev. 45. Such answers are deemed voluntary, because the witness may refuse to answer any question tending to criminate him. If, however, he should be compelled to answer, after claiming his privilege, his answer will be considered compulsory, and cannot be given in evidence against him." The fact that defendant testified in a proceeding in insolvency, and appeared in obedience to a citation, did not deprive him of the privilege. His statements must therefore be considered voluntary. It is hardly necessary to say that had the defendant, at the time he testified, been in custody, or had the criminal charge then been pending against him, and those charges under examination, a different question would have been presented. I recommend that the order and judgment be affirmed.

CARRAHER v. SAN FRANCISCO BRIDGE CO. (No. 15,049.)

RAILROADS—CROSSINGS—HORSE FRIGHTENED.

1. Plaintiff, driving a horse and cart, approached defendant's crossing, when a train appeared on the crossing two feet from the horse, the engine being behind. The horse shied, and upset the cart. There was a coal shed, which was within seven feet of the crossing, and obstructed a view of all cars more than eight feet from the crossing. The evidence as to signals was conflicting. Defendant generally kept a flagman near the crossing, and the engineer testified that the flagman signaled him that the way was clear, from a place behind the coal shed, where the flagman and plaintiff could not have seen each other. Held, that a verdict for plaintiff could not be disturbed.

2. Defendant, having a contract to build a length of sea wall, was hauling sand for filling, in a train of cars on a temporary track along the water front, said train making about 20 trips a day. Subcontractors were hauling stone and other material in large quantities by team on a road crossing over said track. Held, that a charge that said crossing was not a highway crossing was irrelevant on the question of defendant's liability for injuries to one of the teamsters.

3. A teamster driving a horse and cart on a road crossing a railroad track, who is injured by his horse shying at the train, it not debarred from recovery by the fact that the horse was frightened by the ordinary movement, noise, or appearance of the train, if it further appear that the horse was ordinarily well broken and gentle, and was permitted, by defendant's negligence in running the train, to come so close to the crossing, before he or his driver saw the train, that said ordinary movement naturally frightened him.

Action by Michael Carraher against the San Francisco Bridge Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

For report of former appeal, see 22 Pac. Rep. 480.

R. Percy Wright, for appellant. Cary & Sullivan, for appellee.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover damages for a personal injury to plaintiff alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant. The cause was tried by a jury, whose verdict was for the plaintiff, assessing the damages at $1,000, and judgment accordingly. The defendant has appealed from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. The case was here on a former appeal from a similar judgment, and was reversed, on the ground of error in an instruction to the jury. 81 Cal. 98, 22 Pac. Rep. 480. The defendant had a contract with the board of harbor commissioners to construct a section of the sea wall on the water front of the city of San Francisco, which, among other things, required the defendant to fill with sand and rocks a strip between the wall and shore. The sand for this filling was obtained from Black Point, and thence transported by the defendant to the place to be filled (a distance of a mile and a half) on a temporary railroad, by means of a train of 12 to 16 cars, propelled by a steam locomotive. The rock to be filled in was hauled by teams from Telegraph Hill. Cummings & Co. had a subcontract with defendant to haul the rock, or a portion of it, and employed the plaintiff as one of the teamsters for that purpose. The road on which the rock was hauled crossed the railroad track at a point where the latter ran along the water front. While plaintiff was returning with the horse and cart, he was driving, after having delivered a load of rock, and having approached very nearly to the crossing, the foremost car of the sand train passed over the crossing, and frightened his horse. In attempting to back or turn, the horse, cart, and plaintiff were precipitated into an open excavation, whereby the plaintiff's wrist was broken. The engine was not in front of the train, but at the rear, pushing or backing it. Plaintiff testified that, when the foremost car came upon the crossing, he judged the horse's head was within two feet of the car. A coal house and tool house stood only four to seven feet from the crossing, which, according to plaintiff's testimony, prevented him from seeing the approaching train until it came within seven or eight feet of the crossing, and from a diagram furnished by defendant it appears that this may have been true; yet it was contradicted by witnesses on the part of the defendant. The evidence was also conflicting as to whether any signal of the approach of the train was given by whistle or bell. The defendant generally kept a flagman near that point, and the engineer on the train testified that on the occasion of the accident the flagman signaled him that the way was clear. There is also a substantial conflict of evidence as to whether plaintiff's negligence contributed to his injury. The intervening coal house on the line of sight, which the evidence strongly tends to prove, is sufficient of itself to establish a conflict on this issue. It follows that the order denying a new trial cannot be reversed on the ground that the verdict is not justified by the evidence. The most that reasonably can be claimed by appellant is that, on the issue as to contributory negligence, a preponderance of the evidence, as it appears in the record, seems to be in favor of the defendant.

The erroneous instruction on account of which the former judgment was reversed was not repeated on the new trial, but appellant contends that the court erred on the new trial in refusing to give the following instruction, requested by defendant: "The railroad crossing near which the plaintiff was injured, spoken of in the testimony here, was not on any public street. It was on a portion of section six of the sea wall, then in course of construction by the defendant, San Francisco Bridge Company, and under its control."

This requested instruction seems to be wholly composed of matters of fact, any dispute as to which should have been submitted to the jury. But, conceding the instruction (whether fact or law) to be true, what is the consequence? In order to determine the legal effect of the facts stated, other relevant facts which the evidence tended to prove should be considered, namely, that plaintiff hauled about 25 loads of rock per day, that being considered a day's work; that 15 other teams were employed by Cummings & Co. in hauling rock over the same road, and crossing at the same time and for the same purpose; that other teams were hauling lumber and other materials over the same crossing for the construction of the wharf during the same time; and that defendant's train of sand cars made about 20 trips a day. Under these circumstances, was the degree of care required by law of the defendant, while running its sand train, less than it would have been if the roads had been public roads? I think that, under these circumstances, the legal effect of the facts that these roads had been constructed by defendant for its private use, and were wholly under its control, was that defendant was bound to exercise ordinary care for the safety of its employes and subcontractors who were using them by its authority and for its benefit; and it appears that defendant usually recognized its obligation to this extent by signaling the approach of the train by all the modes ordinarily employed for that purpose, but as to whether any kind of signal could have been heard or seen by teamsters approaching the crossing from the wharf the evidence is conflicting. The only signal as to which there is no conflict was that said to have been given by the flagman to the engineer of the train, from a position north of the coal house, where it could not be seen by the plaintiff or any other teamster approaching from the wharf, and from which position the flagman could not have seen the road leading from the wharf to the crossing. On principle, I think this case cannot be distinguished from that of Strong v. Railroad Co., 61 Cal. 326, in which the following instruction had been denied: "If plaintiff's horses were frightened by the mere ordinary appearance of defendant's locomotive or train, or by the ordinary noise of its passage, and his injury caused thereby, he cannot recover." This court, by Mr. Justice McKinstry, said: "This instruction ignores the other circumstances of the case. We cannot say that the plaintiff ought not to have recovered if, by reason of the carelessness of the engine driver, and without any want of prudent care on his own part, he found himself in such close proximity to the locomotive as that his team, composed of horses ordinarily well broken, and of ordinary gentleness, were startled, frightened, and ran. All the circumstances were to be considered by the jury." So here, in his contention that plaintiff cannot recover because his horse was frightened merely by the ordinary movement, noise, or appearance of the cars, counsel for appellant ignores all the other material evidence tending to prove that the movement of the cars which frightened plaintiff's horse was without ordinary care for the safety of the plaintiff and others who may have been rightfully approaching the crossing, and that the want of such ordinary care was the proximate cause of the injury complained of; but it is to be presumed that the jury considered all such evidence, and, since it tended to prove every fact involved in the verdict, I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

WILL v. LYTLE CREEK WATER CO.

(No. 19,244.)

DEFAULT—OPENING—AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS.

1. Defendant's name being the "L. Creek Water Co.," its demurrer wrongly entitled it the "L. Creek Water & Improvement Co." It appeared that there was a corporation with the latter name. The mistake was made by the attorney's stenographer, and was not discovered till two or three days after default entered, when defendant promptly moved for its vacation. Held no abuse of discretion to grant said motion.

2. An affidavit of merits, by counsel, that affiant is personally familiar with the facts; that he knows, of his own knowledge, of facts which constitute a full, meritorious, and legal defense; that defendant has a complete defense,—is sufficient, and not objectionable, merely, as being made by counsel.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; George E. Otis, Judge.

Action by Glenn Will against the Lytle Creek Water Company on a money claim. From an order opening the judgment by default, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Willis & Cole, for appellant. Walter Bordwell, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an appeal from an order setting aside a judgment upon default. Within the time allowed by law for answering, the attorney for the defendant herein filed a demurrer to the complaint, but this demurrer was entitled Glenn Will v. The Lytle Creek Water & Improvement Company. It appears that the mistake was made by the attorney's stenographer, and that there is a corporation named the Lytle Creek Water & Improvement Company. The mistake was not discovered until two or three days after the default was entered, but defendant moved promptly to have the default set aside. As there was no laches, and the mistake was a very natural one, we think that the court did not abuse its discretion in granting the motion.

The affidavit of merits was sufficient. Although made by the attorney of the defendant, it is stated therein that the affiant is personally familiar with the facts connected with the transactions upon which said action is brought; that affiant knows, of his own knowledge, of facts which constitute a full, meritorious, and legal defense to said action; that defendant has a complete defense to said action. It cannot be said, as claimed by appellant, that it is impossible for this statement to be true. The affiant may have had satisfactory evidence, written and oral, that the claim of the plaintiff had been entirely settled and paid off, if any ever existed. The affidavit is not objectionable on the ground, solely, that it was made by counsel for the defendant. Byrne v. Alas, 68 Cal. 479, 9 Pac. Rep. 850. The order affirmed.

SMITH v. CITY OF SAN LUIS OBISPO.

(No. 19,296.)

APPEAL—REVIEW OF DECISION ON PRIOR APPEAL.

Where, on the retrial of an action after a judgment of reversal by the supreme court, the conclusion of the trial court, based on the same facts established on the first trial, is in accordance with the decision on such appeal, such conclusion will not be reviewed on a second appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Ejectment by Levi Smith against the city of San Luis Obispo. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wilcoxon & Bouldin and J. M. Wilcoxon, for appellant. Wm. Shipsey, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action of ejectment, and for a defense the city avers a dedication of the realty as a public street. The case has once been before the court, (95 Cal. 463, 30 Pac. 591,) and a new trial ordered. At the previous trial in the lower court, judgment went for the plaintiff, but it was reversed upon appeal for the reason that the conclusions of law were not supported by the findings of fact; this court holding that the findings were such as to indicate a dedication of the land as a public street, and that consequently judgment should have gone for defendant. Upon the second trial, the court made the same findings of fact, and in accordance with the previous decision of this court, as a conclusion of law, held that defendant was entitled to judgment. This appeal is prosecuted from the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial, and the evidence is before us for review.

The conclusion of the court, based upon its findings that the land was dedicated to public use, will not now be reviewed, for the law of the case to that effect was established by the decision of the court upon the previous appeal.

The only remaining contention upon the part of appellant is that the evidence fails to support the findings of fact. We think the specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence wholly lacking in material respects, but, aside from this objection, we deem the evidence entirely sufficient to form a basis for the findings made. Appellant has failed to indicate in his brief any particular finding that is unsupported, and, upon a perusal of the evidence, we also have failed to discover a lack of support therein. The findings are very full, covering the probative facts of the case; there is evidence to support each one of them; and, the law of the case being established to the effect that such findings warrant the judgment, it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

SHERIFFS—CONCLUSIVENESS OF RETURN—ACTION
BY EXECUTION DEBTOR FOR DAMAGES—ALLEGATIONS OF COMPLAINT—APPEAL—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

1. In an action under Code Civil Proc. §§ 692, 693, by an execution debtor against a sheriff, to recover the statutory penalty and damages for selling land without notice, the sheriff's return on the execution, that he has given notice, is not conclusive in his favor. Egery v. Buchanan, 5 Cal. 54, distinguished.

Petition for rehearing. Denied.

For decision on appeal, see 34 Pac. 654.

BEATTY, C. J. In his petition for a rehearing, counsel for respondent insists that, in reversing the judgment in this case, we have at the same time reversed, without noticing it, a former decision of this court, upon which he relied, and had a right to rely, in advising his client and presenting his case to the trial court; and this supposed grievance is so strongly urged that we feel called upon to point out the fact that it has no existence. The case to which counsel refers is entitled Egery v. Buchanan, and is reported in 5 Cal. 54. It was cited in support of the proposition that, in an action by an execution debtor against a sheriff to recover the statutory penalty and damages for selling land without notice, the sheriff's return on the execution to the effect that he has given notice is conclusive evidence in his favor. It will be seen, however, upon the most casual examination of the case, that it is not authority for any such proposition. That was not, like this, an action on the case against the sheriff for damages, but was a summary proceeding by motion in an action between other parties to enforce the penalties prescribed by section 9 of the act of April 29, 1851, (St. 1851, p. 191;) and all the court was called upon to decide, and all it did decide, was that in that summary proceeding the return of the sheriff (a return of nulla bona) was conclusive in his favor; or, in other words, that the court could not try, upon affidavits, in a collateral proceeding in an action between other parties, issues which were the proper subject of an action against the sheriff, in which he could demand, if he chose, a trial by jury. If this is not made plain by the opinion itself, it certainly is made plain by reference to the authorities cited by counsel, and referred to by the text writers named in the opinion of the court. These decisions—and no doubt many more could be found to the same effect—certainly do establish the doctrine that, as against a collateral attack by motion in the action in which the execution issues, the return of the sheriff of nulla bona is conclusive in his favor; and this is the common-law rule, which was held to have been unaltered and unaffected by the statute above referred to. But the same decisions which enforce this rule expressly concede that the party injured by the neglect or misconduct of the sheriff has his remedy by action, and so it was expressly said in Egery v. Buchanan that the remedy of the plaintiffs was by action for a false return. The language of the opinion immediately following this statement, to the effect that a sheriff's return is not traversable, etc., was used with reference to the proceeding then under review, and not with reference to an action against the sheriff. If the court had meant to say that, in an action for a false return, the return itself is conclusive in favor of the sheriff, the remark would not only have been obiter; it would have been absurd. But it seems to us perfectly apparent that the court neither meant to say nor did say anything of the kind. On the contrary, it stated in plain terms that the remedy of plaintiffs was by an action for a false return.

What, then, is an action for a false return? "False return" was simply the specific name (probably derived from the forms of the original writ) for one of the numerous class of actions on the case. It was not an action in rem, for the purpose of cancelling or setting aside the return in order to pave the way for another action for damages, but was itself an action for damages, founded upon the official misconduct of the sheriff; and therefore all that the court meant, in saying that the remedy of the plaintiffs was by an action for a false return, was that they must proceed by action, not necessarily in the form of the common-law action, but, as our system of pleading and practice enjoins, by filing a complaint alleging the facts material to the right of recovery. And such is precisely the course which this plaintiff has pursued. He has proceeded regularly by action, and his complaint, as it appears to us, contains every allegation necessary to show his right to recover the statutory damages for selling land without the legal notice. Code Civil Proc. §§ 692, 693. There was no demurrer to his complaint, but an answer taking issue upon the fact of notice; and this issue was tried in the superior court as if it was properly raised, all plaintiff's evidence tending to prove want of notice being received without objection. If the complaint is in any respect deficient in substance, the objection should at least have been taken at the trial before it was too late to amend, and, not having been so taken, it ought not now to prevent the granting of a new trial, if the issues actually tried have been found contrary to the evidence. But we do not see that the complaint is in any respect deficient. The only objection suggested by the argument of counsel is that it should, like the declaration in the common-law action for a false return of nulla bona, have alleged the return, and its falsity. But the reasons for putting in those allegations under the common-law practice have no existence under our system, which provides for but one form of action, in which no facts need be alleged except those which must be proved. It was not the return to the writ of fieri facias by which the execution creditor was damaged, but the failure to make the money which the sheriff might have made by properly executing it, and the allegations of the return, and its falsity, were only necessary to show that the plaintiff was proceeding in proper form, for there was one form of procedure by motion, rule, or action where the writ had not been returned, and another form of procedure when it had been returned; and when the return had been made, and was true, the proper procedure was by motion, or by action of debt founded on the return, or in assumpsit for money had and received. So that it was necessary to allege the falsity of the return, when such was the case, in order to show that plaintiff had commenced the proper action, and to avoid a variance. See Tidd's Practice and Chitty's Pleadings, passim. But in this case there was no such necessity. The plaintiff was damaged, and his cause of action under the statute complete, as soon as the defendant delivered a certificate of purchase to the purchaser at the execution sale, if in fact the sale was without notice, for the title of the purchaser does not depend on the sheriff's return, and in the absence of such return the debtor is obliged either to redeem his land, or run the risk of losing it by proof aliunde that the sale was valid.

If these views are well founded, counsel will see that a more careful study of his authorities would have made it plain to him, as it seems to us, that we have not, on this point, made a wide, or any, "departure from what has been deemed settled rules of law."

As to the other proposition upon which counsel bases his petition for a rehearing, viz. that we have gone contrary to the settled practice of the court, in reversing a finding of fact as to which the evidence is conflicting, we have only to remark that the rule he invokes is not that a finding will be sustained whenever there is any evidence, however slight, tending to prove the fact found, but is more correctly stated as follows: A finding, though against the apparent weight of evidence, will not be disturbed if there is substantial conflict of evidence as to the fact found. In this case we think the conflict is not substantial. Counsel seem to think that because a sheriff's return is, in some cases, conclusive, it is therefore to be regarded as of great weight in the cases in which it is merely prima facie sufficient to establish the facts stated. But the considerations of policy and convenience upon which the rule is founded, that, as between the parties to an action and their privies, the return of a sheriff is conclusive, have no application in a suit against him for neglect of official duty. In such cases his return, although prima facie evidence in his favor, is essentially weak evidence; and when, in the face of positive testimony that subsequent to the making of the return he has distinctly admitted its falsity, he offers neither denial nor explanation of such admissions, the effect of his return as evidence in his favor is completely overcome, and is not sufficient to sustain a finding that the return is true. Rehearing denied.

THRELKEL v. SCOTT. (No. 18,157.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — BETWEEN HUSBAND AND WIFE—MOTION TO SET ASIDE.

1. In an action to set aside a conveyance as in fraud of creditors, an allegation in the complaint that the grantor was insolvent when the conveyance was made, and that it was done with intent to defraud creditors, is sufficient, without specifically stating the manner in which the fraud was accomplished, and the conduct and acts in reference to it.

2. In such an action, statements made by the grantor shortly before executing the conveyance, showing his knowledge of his indebtedness, are admissible on the question of his intention in conveying away his property.

3. The fact that one conveys a large portion of his property, without valuable consideration, to his wife, knowing at the time that his debts cannot be paid without recourse to such property, tends strongly to prove that the conveyance was made with intent to defraud creditors.

4. The fact that the wife, on receipt of the deed, promised to pay all her husband's debts, does not preclude a finding that the conveyance was fraudulent as against his creditors, since it may have been intended to give her an advantage as to the time of making payment, and thus hinder and delay creditors.

5. Knowledge of the wife as to her husband's intention to defraud creditors on transferring his property to her is immaterial where she parted with no valuable consideration.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Action by G. L. Threlkel, administrator, etc., of Robert N. Scott, deceased, against Harriet A. Scott, to set aside a conveyance by deceased to defendant as in fraud of creditors. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Tuttle & Tuttle, for appellant. Hale & Craig and J. M. Fulweiler, for appellee.

TEMPLE, C. This action was brought under section 1589, Code Civil Proc., to recover for the estate property conveyed by the deceased, on the ground that the conveyance was made to defraud creditors. Defendant appeals from the judgment and an order refusing her a new trial. The case has been here before. See 89 Cal. 351, 26 Pac. 879. Since the first appeal the complaint was amended by adding an averment to the effect that the conveyance was made with the intent to defraud creditors. The complaint now avers facts showing the due appointment of the plaintiff as administrator; his qualification as such; that deceased was indebted in the sum of about $5,000, for which amount claims have been presented to plaintiff, as administrator, and which have been duly allowed. The assets in the hands of plaintiff, and their value, are stated, showing that they are insufficient to pay the claims allowed. The complaint then proceeds to charge: That October 4, 1888, deceased, being ill and contemplating approaching death, conveyed to the defendant, his wife, certain property, specially described in the complaint, and that defendant has since claimed to be the lawful owner thereof. That the conveyance was without any valuable consideration, and that at the time said Scott was indebted for all the liabilities presented against his estate and was insolvent. "That with intent to defraud his creditors, and to prevent the application of the proceeds of his said property to the payment of his just debts and liabilities, he fraudulently conveyed the same to his said wife, the defendant herein; and plaintiff avers upon information and belief that it will require the whole of said property, and the value thereof remaining after the satisfaction of liens existing thereon at the time of said conveyance, to meet and discharge the said allowed claims due and payable out of the funds of said estate."

The point is made on demurrer to the amended complaint that it does not sufficiently set out the facts constituting the alleged fraud. It is contended that the manner in which the fraud was accomplished, and all conduct and acts in reference to it, should be specifically stated. I think the facts are stated with sufficient particularity. They are the insolvency of the intestate, and the conveyance with the intent to defraud his creditors. These facts alone are sufficient. The case is not like that where deceit or imposition is charged. Each of these ultimate facts may be proved by a great variety of probative facts, the nature of which are not disclosed by the general statement. In such cases justice requires that further information should be given to enable a defendant to understand the charge made against him. Not so here. In fact, it is difficult to see how the charge can be made more specific.

Objection is made to the ruling admitting certain statements alleged to have been made by Scott at the time the deed was executed, and some six weeks prior to that time. These statements tended to show that Scott knew of his indebtedness, and hence to throw light upon the question of his intention when he executed the deed. The evidence was properly admitted.

It is not necessary to review the action of the court in overruling defendant's motion for nonsuit, for defendant did not rest there, but proceeded to put in further evidence. The question now is, does the evidence sustain the findings? The fact that one conveys a large portion of his property, without a valuable consideration, to his wife, knowing at the time that his debts cannot be paid without recourse to such property, tends strongly to prove that the conveyance was made with intent to defraud creditors. There is nothing in Bull v. Bray, 89 Cal. 294, 26 Pac. 873, opposed to this. On the contrary, this proposition is taken for granted in the opinion in that case. It is there only held that, however clear the evidence may be, the fraudulent intent must be found as a fact, and cannot be deduced as a conclusion of law from the finding that one greatly indebted conveyed a portion or all of his property as a gift. Although such facts, if found, might sufficiently prove fraud, still, under our statute, fraud is itself always a fact to be found by the jury, or the court when sitting without a jury. The fact of fraud was found here, and the finding is sustained by the evidence.

We do not know whether the court believed the testimony to the effect that Mrs. Scott promised, on receipt of the deed, that she would see all the debts paid; but, even accepting such statement as a fact, it would still leave room for the finding of a fraudulent intent. It might still have been intended to give her an advantage, in that she could take her own time to pay. This would tend to prove a design to hinder and delay creditors.

There was evidence from which the court might justly infer that Scott knew that the insurance policy, if the amount were paid to the estate, would not pay all his debts. There was evidence tending to show that he knew of his indebtedness, and the presumption is that he knew the condition of his affairs. Whether Mrs. Scott knew the condition of her husband's affairs is immaterial, as she gave no valuable consideration for the property; but I think there was evidence tending to show knowledge on her part. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PEOPLE v. KINDELBERGER. (No. 21,020.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 27, 1893.)

CRIMINAL LAW—REMARKS OF JUDGE—URGING JURY TO AGREE.

In a criminal prosecution, where the jury return into court some time after the case has been submitted to them, and state that there is no prospect for an agreement, it is prejudicial error for the judge to state that, in view of the evidence, he is at a loss to understand why the jury should disagree, since such remark cannot fail to create the impression that in his opinion the evidence required a conviction; and such error is not cured by his afterwards telling them that they are sole judges of all questions of fact, and of the credibility of the witnesses.

D. T. Sullivan and W. J. Donovan, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant was found guilty of the crime of assault with intent to commit rape, and was sentenced by the judgment of the superior court to imprisonment in the state prison for a term of seven years. The appeal here is from the judgment, and is brought to this court upon the judgment roll alone, without any bill of exceptions.

The jury retired to deliberate upon their verdict at 9 o'clock in the evening, and, not having agreed, the jurors, upon their own request, were brought into court at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of the next day, when the following proceedings took place: "The Court: Well, upon what point do you desire instruction or points? A Juror: By request of the jurymen, I would ask if there could be any other form of verdict in the case? The Court: Is that all? A Juror: That is all, except that we are unable to agree. No prospect of agreeing. The Court: In reply to the latter part of the statement,—that the jury are unable to agree, and that there is no prospect of their agreeing,—the court has this to say: That, in view of the testimony in this case, the court is utterly at a loss to know why twelve honest men cannot agree in this case. Let me have that information, please. In that connection, further, I have this to say: That, in my short experience upon the bench, I have occasionally been associated with juries where some jurors, having an idea that they are smart men, prominent men, with large heads and big capacity, on going to the jury room, take occasion to express ill-digested and rapid opinions upon the case, and then stick to these opinions, right or wrong, unreasonably refusing to listen to the opinion and arguments of their fellow jurors, and so hang a jury. I have on some occasions, having something of a personal knowledge of jurors on the jury, taken occasion to caution the jurors against that course, and to say that jurors ought to go into the jury box without prejudice, without fear, without favor, with a desire to arrive at the truth, to sift and digest the testimony carefully and conscientiously, and not stubbornly to express an ill-digested opinion, and stick to it. I repeat, gentlemen, that I see no reason on earth why a jury in this case, upon this testimony, cannot agree."

In thus addressing the jury, the learned judge of the superior court committed an error to the prejudice of the defendant. Nothing can be clearer than that in this charge the judge informed the jury that he had a fixed and definite conviction in regard to the verdict which they ought to return, and that in his opinion the evidence to support such conclusion was so plain and satisfactory that honest and intelligent jurors, who had heard the testimony, ought not to disagree as to its weight and effect; and we think the jury understood, or at least may have understood, from these unguarded remarks, that in the opinion of the judge the defendant was guilty, and that such should be the verdict. When, upon the trial of a defendant, the evidence is clearly insufficient to justify a verdict of guilty, it is the duty of the judge to so inform the jury, and to advise a verdict of acquittal. This power is sometimes exercised by courts, and is one so frequently invoked in the trial of criminal cases that its existence may be regarded as a matter of common knowledge upon the part of jurors of ordinary intelligence and experience; and this fact is not to be lost sight of in considering the impression likely to have been made upon the jury by the charge of the judge in this case. To any one knowing that it is the duty of the court to advise an acquittal if the evidence is such that, in the opinion of the judge, 12 honest men would have no right to convict him, the remarks of the judge in this case could not fail to create the impression that he thought the jury ought to convict upon the evidence before them. But it is not necessary that we should be able to say that the jury must have so understood the charge. Unless it appears that it could not have been so understood, we cannot say that the charge was without prejudice to the defendant. The court has no right, except when advising an acquittal, to give any expression of its opinion as to the weight of evidence, or to tell the jury that the evidence is so clear that they, as honest men, ought not to disagree, which is in effect the same as telling them that there is no conflict in the evidence, and that, as honest men, they can render but one verdict. In a subsequent part of the charge the learned judge did inform the jury that they were the sole judges of all questions of fact, and of the credibility of the witnesses, and that the court had no right to trench upon their province in this respect; but the error already noticed in the previous part of the charge was not cured by this subsequent statement. The fact still remained impressed upon the minds of the jurors that it was the opinion of the judge that there ought to be no disagreement, and that the testimony would justify but one verdict. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. HANDLEY. (No. 21,021.)

ARSON—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—PLEADING AND PROOF.

An information for arson of a dwelling house which specifically describes it by its street number, and alleges that it was occupied by defendant, sufficiently identifies the property, without giving the owner's name; and the statement of such name in the information does not necessitate its proof on the trial, since it is merely an addition to a description which is full and complete without it.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Robert Ferrall, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

FITZGERALD, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of arson in the second degree, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of six years. From the judgment of conviction, and the order denying his motion for a new trial, this appeal is taken. Appellant relies for a reversal on two grounds: First, failure to prove the alleged ownership of the burned building; second, insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict.

The house alleged to have been burned by the defendant is described in the information as follows: "A certain inhabited building, situate at number 139 Dolores street, in said city and county of San Francisco, the property of one Ellen Bolton, then and there actually occupied by the said Martin H. Handley," the defendant. It is claimed by appellant that the name of Ellen Bolton, the alleged owner of the building, does not appear, except as stated, anywhere in the record, and that there was no evidence adduced on the trial in support of such allegation of ownership. On this point, Miss Nellie Thompson, a witness for the prosecution, testified as follows: "* * * My mother owns the premises 139 Dolores street. First saw defendant on 2d March. He wanted to see the house, and asked for the keys. Was with another man. Showed him the house. Said he would take it, and paid $2. Next day paid the balance, and got the keys,—four in all. Said would move in the following day. I was present at the fire, March 6th. The man with Handley was about his size, fair complexion, blonde mustache." The rule with reference to the proof required to support an information or indictment is that every fact or circumstance necessary to constitute the crime charged is material, and must be alleged and proved. But the allegation of a fact or circumstance not legally essential to the charge is mere surplusage, and may be disregarded. There are allegations, however, not necessarily essential, and which may be dispensed with; but, when they are laid in the information or indictment, they become material, and must be proved in all cases, when descriptive of the identity of that which is necessary to the charge. In the case before us, the name of the owner, although alleged, was immaterial, because it was not a necessary part of the description of the crime charged, therefore not necessary to be proved. Omitting the name of Ellen Bolton from the description contained in the information, such description is a sufficient identification of the house which the defendant is charged with burning; and the evidence adduced at the trial tended to show that, at the time of the fire referred to, he occupied it as the tenant of another, who was the owner thereof, and that he paid such owner the rent therefor. It therefore follows that proof of the name of the owner, under these circumstances, would be merely an addition to a description which in itself is full and complete without it.

With reference to the remaining point, relating to the insufficiency of the evidence, it is sufficient to say that it justifies the verdict. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HILL. (No. 21,017.)

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—INTENT.

On a prosecution for embezzlement, evidence that defendant, two months after the offense charged in the information embezzled another sum of money from defendant, is not admissible to show his intention in taking the first sum.

Commissioner's decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

M. E. C. Munday, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

BELCHER, C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of embezzlement, and the judgment was that he be punished by imprisonment in the state prison at Folsom for the term of three years. From this judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. The information charges that on the 10th day of August, 1892, the defendant received from one Robert C. Brinkley, as his agent, the sum of $390 in lawful money of the United States, which he was to pay over to one W. E. De Groot for and on account of Brinkley, but that, in violation of the terms and objects of his agency, he did then and there, on the day named, "unlawfully, willfully, fraudulently, corruptly, and feloniously retain, withhold, secrete, embezzle, and convert and appropriate to his own use," out of the $390 so received, the amount and sum of $300, whereby said Brinkley was deprived and defrauded of the said sum by the defendant. The appellant contends that the verdict was not justified by the evidence, and hence that the judgment should be reversed.

It was proved that Brinkley and defendant had been acquainted for 25 years. In February, 1892, defendant came to this state, and immediately went to the house of Brinkley, in Los Angeles, and remained there until September following, when he left for San Francisco, where he obtained employment. In May, 1892, Brinkley went east, and was there engaged and traveling about with a theatrical company. During his absence, defendant attended to his financial affairs, paid his bills, etc. Brinkley testified: "During the time I was in the east, Mr. Hill stayed at my house, and transacted my business for me here. He paid my family expenses. I sent the money to my wife, and she turned it over to him." And Mrs. Brinkley testified: "During my husband's absence, he sent me about $100 per month. Sometimes he sent the money to me, and sometimes to Mr. Hill, to pay the family expenses. * * * When Mr. Hill was at our house as our guest, he was very kind. He took care of the children, when they were sick, and looked after the household expenses. He paid the doctor's bills, the grocer, and he paid the electrician who put in the electric plant in our house. I never handled a cent, unless he gave it to me. As soon as I got the money I indorsed it, and gave it to him." Brinkley was indebted to De Groot on a promissory note which became due August 10th, and was secured by a mortgage on his household furniture. The amount due on the note for principal and interest at its maturity was $390. On July 20th he wrote defendant from Chicago: "By the way, my note to De Groot will be due on the 10th of August, and I have the money to meet it, and will send it to you as soon as I get back to Memphis. But if he will extend the note for three months longer by your paying the interest for three months $90, you had better pay Thiele, Clements, and others, and I will be in a position to meet the note at the time. I don't know whether he will or not, but you had better try him." Again, on August 1st, he wrote defendant from Memphis: "You had better draw on me for the money to pay De Groot, if he won't wait and extend the note. If he will, you can pay the others. Has June got the money to go home on? I will bet she has not, so I will have to pay for her ticket, I suppose. Let me know, but don't push me too hard, as you know Will gets the bulk of the profits from the opera company and theater." On the 10th of August, Brinkley caused a telegram to be sent by a bank in Memphis to a bank in Los Angeles, directing the payment to defendant of $390, and the money was promptly paid. Shortly after receiving the money, defendant paid to De Groot $90, and he (De Groot) agreed to wait for the balance.

In October, Brinkley came to San Francisco, and remained there about two weeks. While there, defendant was with him all the time, but nothing was said about the money. He then went to Los Angeles, and there saw De Groot, and was told by him that only $90 had been paid on his note. After two days, he returned to San Francisco, and again met defendant and told him what De Groot said about the payment. Defendant said he had paid the whole debt, and he would go to Los Angeles and prove it. The two then went to Los Angeles, and met De Groot, and defendant and De Groot contradicted each other, and had a quarrel about the matter. The next day, defendant told Brinkley that he had paid De Groot all the $390, excepting $25, and that if Brinkley would let him have that sum he would go over and pay De Groot, and get a receipt for the whole business. Brinkley gave him the $25, and he went away, but returned shortly, and said De Groot would not accept the money. Brinkley owed Niles Pease $89, and he then handed the defendant $64 more, and told him to go and pay Pease. Defendant went into Pease's store, and, when he came out, said to Brinkley: "Come on home, and I will tell you something." They then got on a cable car, and went home, and Brinkley says: "In my parlor or library, he told me he hadn't paid the money to De Groot. He said he had used the money for other things. He didn't tell me right then what he did with it. He told me later in the day." On cross-examination, Brinkley testified: "A few days before this trial, and after Hill's examining trial, I received * * * a letter, in Hill's handwriting, containing a list of things * * * which it was claimed he paid out money for. He never would tell me before how he paid out the De Groot money I sent him. I do not know that he paid for my sister-in-law's ticket when she went east. Mr. Hill was attending to the payment of my family expenses. I didn't know whether he paid out this three hundred dollars for family expenses or not. I don't know what he did with it. * * * The only thing I know about it is that Dr. Thiele was paid, and I didn't know until a few days ago that he was paid. That was $50 that I owed Dr. Thiele. I thought it was strange that he did not present his bill, and I heard that he had been paid, and I went around to see him, and he said that he had received fifty dollars. I didn't know, as a matter of fact, that Mr. Hill ever took a dollar of my three hundred dollars for his own personal purposes. I couldn't tell what he did with it. I asked him, and he said that he spent it. That is all." The defendant, in his own behalf, testified: "With this $390 that I received, * * * I went immediately to Mr. De Groot, and paid this $90, this interest, which I was to pay as soon as the money arrived, and Mr. De Groot said it was all right, and he would allow the principal to go on. I went immediately, and paid Dr. Thiele $50, and paid this electrician claim of $17.50, and I paid his sister's expenses back east, which amounted to a hundred and some odd dollars, and some small bills, drug bills, or something like that; and in that way the money was all expended for Mr. Brinkley's household expenses, and I received not a dollar benefit for myself. * * * His debts here were very numerous. There was the grocer bill, doctor bill, electrician, and, well, most every kind of a bill that could go to make up household expenses, ranging from $10 up to $125, * * * the general expenses, which amounted to between a hundred and twenty and a hundred and thirty dollars. He sent a hundred dollars per month expense money, but the general expenses run over that."

The above is a brief statement of the material evidence in this case, and certainly it appears to be by no means strong or conclusive. Looking at all the evidence, it seems to us that the jurors might well have entertained a reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant was guilty or not. There was, however, some evidence, and the verdict cannot, in our opinion, be disturbed on appeal upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify it.

Appellant further contends that several errors of law were committed by the court which also call for a reversal. One of these alleged errors only need be noticed. Brinkley testified, as before stated, that he handed defendant $25, and then $64, and told him to go and pay his debt to Niles Pease with it; that they shortly after went to his house, and defendant then told him that he had not paid the money to De Groot, but had used it for other things. Mr. Dupuy, the deputy district attorney, then asked the witness, "When he told you that, what did you say to him, if anything?" The question was objected to by defendant on the ground that it was immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and the objection was overruled and an exception reserved. The witness answered: "I asked him to give back the eighty-nine dollars that I had given him to pay Pease, and he would not do it. He says: 'No, you have lost confidence in me, and I won't give you this money, and you go back to San Francisco, and leave me here in the lurch to hustle for myself.'" During his argument of the case, Mr. Dupuy said to the jury: "There was an embezzlement of the $89 he had given to him to pay other debts." Counsel for defendant interrupted the attorney for the people, and objected to any argument about the $89. The court said: "The Niles Pease matter, of course, cannot have any bearing upon the present charge, except, perhaps, since it was admitted in evidence as bearing upon the intent; but, even though he had absolutely embezzled that money of Pease, it has nothing to do with this case. But it is in evidence, and is a part of the evidence in this case, and, as bearing on the intent, I think counsel has a right to comment upon it." Counsel for Defendant: "My objection is that it cannot be a proof of intent, and of something that occurred in November, from which it is sought to prove or support the intent of something that occurred in August. He might have stolen a cow in November, and it would not prove intent in August." The Court: "This was brought as a part of the transaction and talk between the defendant and Brinkley. Objection overruled." Mr. Dupuy, continuing, then said: "The two transactions came together then, and while this young man was finding out the flood of this stream, the very flood involved in that stream commingled with it other infernal rascality of this defendant." The evidence objected to was clearly inadmissible. What the parties said about the $89 was not a part of the res gestae, and had no connection with the alleged embezzlement two months before. The prosecution had no right to introduce such evidence for the purpose of showing an intent to embezzle the $300 and its attorney had no right to comment upon it as a circumstance tending to show defendant's guilt. The rule is that every error is presumed to work injury, unless it appears that no injury could have resulted. That the defendant here might have been, and probably was, prejudiced by the erroneous rulings of the court, is quite apparent. It results, in our opinion, that the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

GAROUTTE and HARRISON, JJ. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

PATERSON, J. I concur. The evidence relating to the defendant's retention of the $89 does not bring the case within the decision in People v. Gray, 66 Cal. 275, 5 Pac. 240. "It is a dangerous species of evidence" in any case. Com. v. Shepard, 1 Allen, 581.

PEOPLE v. LANE. (No. 20,906.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1893.)
HOMICIDE—RES GESTAE—EVIDENCE OF INTENTION —SUBSEQUENT OFFENSE—INTOXICATION.

1. During a struggle between defendant and deceased in a house to which defendant had come to arrest deceased and another person, the fatal wound was given. Held, on prosecution for the homicide, that the shooting of defendant at the other person outside the house, where such person followed defendant a few minutes after the homicide, was not part of the res gestae.

2. Such subsequent offense is not admissible on the issues of whether the homicide was accidental or intentional, and, if intentional, whether it was deliberate and premeditated.

3. In a homicide case, an instruction that no act of a voluntarily intoxicated person is less criminal by reason of such condition, is proper in connection with qualifications as to cases where the actual existence of an intention is a necessary element of the offense.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; S. A. Holmes, Judge.

William G. Lane was convicted of murder, and appeals. Reversed.

R. B. Terry, S. J. Hinds, and W. B. Tyler, for appellant. W. D. Tupper and Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

HAYNES, C. The defendant was tried for the murder of William G. Canfield. The jury returned a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree, with imprisonment for life. This appeal is from the judgment rendered upon the verdict, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

Appellant, at the time of the homicide, was a constable at Sanger, Fresno county. Late at night he went to a house of prostitution for the purpose of arresting the deceased and one Coleman for residing in a house of ill fame, taking two men whom he found upon the street as a posse to aid him in making the arrest. Arriving at the house, appellant knocked at the door, and replied to a question from one of the inmates that he was Lane, the constable. The girl opened the door, when appellant and the other two men entered, and appellant then said he "wanted every man in the house." George Glenn, one of the men who went to the house with the constable, was called on behalf of the people, and testified that Lane told him he had to go with him, and that he was going to arrest "these men." That another man was with Lane, whom he did not know, and had never since seen. That when the door was opened he walked in with Lane. "That Canfield came out of one of the rooms, and Lane said, 'You can consider yourself under arrest,' or words to that effect. That Canfield said: 'What authority have you to arrest me? Show me your warrant;' and Bill [meaning Lane] had his gun in his left hand, and at that Canfield made a grab for the gun, and Bill put out his right hand, and says, 'Come, go with me;' and he was grabbing the gun at that time; and when the scuffle started with the gun, I turned round and left. I ran away. I heard a shot when I got about fifty yards from the house." Loe Wilson, called for the people, testified that she opened the door when defendant said he was a constable, and he and two other men came in. That Lane then said he wanted every man in the house. That Canfield came forward, and asked Lane where his warrant was. That Lane had a revolver in his hand, and replied, "This is my warrant." That witness could not remember how he had the revolver. "He had it right in front of him. I think Mr. Canfield pushed his hand up, to keep him from shooting him." That just then she heard a shot. That she heard two shots in the house. After the second shot was fired, Canfield walked back in the hall, and said he was shot; and that she thought Lane had gone outside of the house. The witness could not tell how long a time elapsed between the two shots, but thought one was right after the other. That she did not see the second shot fired, because she had turned to go back in the hall. That when the first shot was fired they were standing close together, face to face. That at the time the second shot was fired they were standing up and Lane had hold of Canfield. Emma Newman did not remember anything the defendant said. That Canfield said something about a warrant. That when Lane came in he had a pistol in his right hand. That there were some words between him and Canfield, and afterwards a scuffle, and then some shots fired. That she heard the first shot, and went back in the room, (the second room back from the front door,) and was in the room when the second shot was fired. That "after the second shot was fired Canfield came back to the room we were in, and said he was shot. He then turned and walked into the hall again." That she next saw Canfield lying by the first door on the right-hand side. That the light was an ordinary lantern, and she did not know where that was. The light was dim. Upon cross-examination the witness testified that there was a scuffle, but she did not see Canfield grab the pistol. That he was trying to hold Lane with one hand and push him out of the house, and thought he was trying to get the pistol; and they were still struggling when she got back to the door. That they struggled "about three or four or five minutes, probably. Canfield was trying to throw him back, to throw him out. He was trying to get hold of something. I supposed it was the pistol." They were not struggling when the first shot was fired. She thought they were not together; that Canfield was between the witness and Lane. That she was not noticing Canfield particularly; was anxious about Miss Wilson. Coleman testified to the conversation at the door substantially as the other witnesses. He remained in the back room, and it does not appear that he saw any part of the transaction, or that he was seen by Lane; that the first he saw was Canfield on the hall floor after he was shot, but that the two shots were close together,—"crack, crack, just as fast as you could pull;" and indicated by clapping his hands at an interval of about half a second. After Canfield fell in the hall, Coleman examined him, and found the wound in his back, which a medical witness described as about one inch and a half from the spinal column, fracturing the eleventh rib, and ranging inwards and upwards, and from which death resulted about a week later. After Coleman discovered the wound, he started to find a physician, and was permitted, against the objection of defendant, to testify as follows: "When I started, the defendant had gone out of the house. I went out of the front door. I went down, ran down the steps, and I got a short distance away when there were two shots fired. I heard this defendant say, 'There is the son of a bitch I want,' and some one with him replied in a low tone to him. I don't know what he said. I did not see him. And immediately after saying that, as quick as possible, I heard the click of the gun, and I dropped. I threw myself on the ground to get out of range. There were two shots fired. They both went over me or by me. Then I went for the doctor, got him, and came back with him." The time between the shooting of Canfield and the firing of the shots outside of the house is variously estimated by the witnesses. Emma Newman placed it at about 10 minutes; Loe Wilson said, "a few minutes;" and Coleman, "two or three minutes." Appellant duly excepted to the admission of the evidence of the shooting at Coleman, and contends that the ruling admitting it was erroneous. Respondent contends that it was admissible upon either of two grounds: (1) That the shooting of Coleman after he left the house was a part of the res gestae; (2) that, considering it as a distinct offense, it was competent to show motive, or intention to kill, and that the killing of Canfield was not, as defendant claimed, accidental.

The importance of the questions here presented can scarcely be overestimated. If the evidence as to what occurred in the house made it clear that appellant, of his willful, deliberate, and premeditated malice, murdered Canfield, no necessity existed to prove the subsequent shooting at Coleman; while if it did not make it clear that the killing was of the deliberate, willful, and premeditated malice of appellant, the verdict finding appellant guilty of murder in the first degree was wrong, unless the jury could find from the subsequent occurrence that the killing of Canfield was deliberate and premeditated. No one except the jurors can tell whether the deliberation and premeditation which the jury found to have existed were based upon the one set of facts or the other, or upon both. That the shooting at Coleman was not part of the res gestae is clear. The thing in litigation was the killing of Canfield during a struggle in the house. The fatal wound had been given, the struggle ended, and appellant had left the house. How long a time had elapsed—whether three minutes or ten minutes—is immaterial. What occurred outside of the house was no part of the transaction which occurred in the house. That was entirely ended, so far as appellant was concerned. "As soon as we pass the line which distinguishes between the transaction talking of itself, and talking as modifying the transaction,—in other words, as soon as we pass the line between the time of the transaction and the time that follows it,—we have no limits that can be imposed." Whart. Crim. Ev. (9th Ed.) § 262. "An act cannot be varied, qualified, or explained either by a declaration which amounts to no more than a mere narrative of a past occurrence, or of an isolated conversation held, or an isolated act done, at a later period." 1 Tayl. Ev. 52. It is urged by counsel for respondent that the two acts could not be more contemporaneous than they were; that "the double shooting sprang as offshoot performances from one central impulse and impetus, to wit, the drunken, brutal assault upon the house." But the assault upon the house was not the issue being tried. It was the murder of Canfield,—a single substantive offense. If, during the struggle between appellant and Canfield, Coleman had appeared, and, to prevent his interference, or with a deliberate purpose, he had killed him, it would have formed a part of the transaction, and as such could have been given in evidence. I can perceive no such relation between the two acts as make the second a part of the one act under investigation. People v. Ah Lee, 60 Cal. 85, and People v. Wong Ark, 96 Cal. 126, 30 Pac. 1115, discuss the question, especially in relation to declarations; but the principles there announced, I think, fully sustain my conclusion that the shooting at Coleman was not a part of the res gestae which were then under investigation by the jury. Nor do I think the admission of the evidence in question can be sustained upon the second ground above mentioned. The learned counsel for the people say that it is claimed that the killing of Canfield was accidental; that, "since motive is the only question now to be investigated, this testimony was rightly introduced;" and ask the significant question: "Will it be maintained for an instant that the jury must be denied this light, and must be compelled to grope about in the dark to determine how the shooting was done, and in what frame of mind defendant was when he killed deceased?"—while appellant contends that without that testimony the jury could not have found the defendant guilty of a higher offense than manslaughter. It would therefore seem to be conceded that this evidence was controlling in its effect; and its admissibility should therefore be carefully considered, lest the appellant should escape the just punishment of his offense, or be punished for an offense he did not commit.

That evidence of a distinct and substantive offense cannot be admitted in support of the charge of the commission of another offense, is a general rule laid down by all the authorities. This rule excludes all evidence of collateral facts, or those which are incapable of affording any reasonable presumption or inference as to the principal fact or matter in dispute. The most familiar exceptions to the general rule above stated are cases of passing or offering to pass counterfeit money. As one may innocently pass or offer to pass a counterfeit bill or coin, not knowing that it is such, proof of prior passing or offers to pass the same or similar counterfeits is competent for the purpose of proving guilty knowledge, even though such proof shows the commission of another and complete offense. The general rule above stated is in fact but the reiteration of the still more general rule that in all cases, civil or criminal, the evidence must be confined to the point in issue. "No fact which, on principles of sound logic, does not sustain or impeach a pertinent hypothesis is relevant; and no such fact, therefore, unless otherwise provided by some positive prescription of law, should be admitted as evidence on a trial. The reason of the rule is obvious. To admit evidence of such collateral facts would be to oppress the party implicated, by trying him on a case for preparing which he has no notice, and sometimes by prejudicing the jury against him." Whart. Crim. Ev. § 29. "In criminal cases there are peculiar reasons why the test before us should be applied to proof of collateral crimes." Whart. Crim. Ev. § 30. Applying these tests to the evidence in question, it must be remembered that there was no question that the fatal wound was inflicted by a ball discharged from appellant's pistol, and the questions to be resolved were: (1) Was the shooting accidental or intentional? (2) If intentional, was it deliberate and premeditated? Any inference to be drawn from a subsequent offense, or act constituting an offense, must be a logical inference. It is true that it is not necessary that the collateral offense, whether prior or subsequent, should conclusively prove the guilt of the accused of the offense for the commission of which he is being tried, in order to render it admissible in evidence; but, as evidence of another offense manifestly tends to his prejudice, there ought to be some clear connection between the two offenses by which it may be logically inferred that, if guilty of the one, he is of the other. It is not like the admission of some collateral fact, which, if it does not, in the opinion of the jury, prove the fact intended, yet leaves no stain or prejudice to color or pervert the direct evidence of the offense under investigation. That there was no logical or necessary connection between the intent with which the shots were fired at Coleman and the intention or absence of intention with which the shots were fired in the house, is, I think, clear. The circumstances were different, the persons were different, the result was different, and the times of the two transactions, though not widely separated, were different. The only link connecting the two, if it may be so called, was that appellant went to the house to arrest both, and that fact, therefore, only proves the intention to arrest; not to kill. It is obvious that Lane may have fired the shots in the house accidentally, or without any intention of taking the life of Canfield, or in necessary self-defense, and yet have instantly formed the purpose to kill Coleman when he saw him come out of the house. None of the circumstances of the case indicate that appellant went to the house with a pre-existing intention of taking the life of any one, and the court correctly charged the jury that no appreciable time was necessary for deliberation or premeditation, and certainly that was true of the intention to kill Coleman, if it existed.

Counsel for appellant cites the case of Farris v. People, 129 Ill. 521, 21 N. E. 821, in which this question was fully considered and many cases cited. The court, after stating that testimony which is relevant to the issue is not to be excluded because it tends to prove the commission of another crime, said: "But the general rule is against receiving evidence of another offense, and no authority can be found to justify its admission, unless it clearly appears that such evidence tends in some way to prove the accused guilty of the crime for which he is on trial." Agnew, J., in Shaffner v. Com., 72 Pa. St. 65, said: "If the evidence be so dubious that the judge does not clearly perceive the connection, the benefit of the doubt should be given to the prisoner, instead of suffering the minds of the jurors to be prejudiced by an independent fact, carrying with it no proper evidence of the particular guilt." In that case the prisoner was indicted for the murder of his wife by poison. There was evidence of his criminal intimacy with the wife of S., on whose life there was an insurance, the proceeds of which, on his death, the defendant had tried to procure. It was held that evidence that S. died with the same symptoms as the defendant's wife, and had been attended by the defendant, was inadmissible. In the case of Farris v. People, supra, Farris went to the house of McGehee when the family were at dinner, and, declaring that he had come there to kill him, shot and killed him. Within half an hour after, and before he left the premises he committed a rape upon Mrs. McGehee, and this was put in evidence upon his trial, over his objection. It was contended there, as here, that the prosecution had a right to show all the defendant did from the time he came to the place of the killing until he left it, as part of one and the same transaction; but the appellate court held that the admission of the evidence was error, and reversed the judgment, and this, notwithstanding the opinion of the appellate court that the direct evidence of the homicide was sufficient to justify the verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree, as it could not be known but that the jury, in the absence of the evidence erroneously received, would have spared his life. In State v. Lapage, 57 N. H. 245, it was said by Cushing, C. J.: "I take it to be generally true that any act of the prisoner may be put in evidence against him, provided it has any logical and legal tendency to prove any matter which is in issue between him and the state, notwithstanding it might have an indirect bearing, which, in strictness, it ought not to have, upon some other matter in issue. It may be that in some cases the danger resulting from such indirect bearing might be so great in comparison with its importance in regard to matters on which its bearing was legitimate that it ought not to be admitted." In that case the learned judge, after putting an extreme case, further said: "I mention this case to illustrate the necessity of extreme caution not to admit such testimony unless there can be seen some distinct logical connection, such as the law requires, between the fact proposed to be proved and the fact in issue." See, also, the opinions of Ladd, J., and Smith, J., in the same case, and the opinion of Peckham, J., in People v. Sharp, 107 N. Y. 466, 14 N. E. 319; People v. Corbin, 56 N. Y. 363; Coleman v. People, 55 N. Y. 90.

It is clear that the shooting at Coleman did not tend to show a "motive" for the killing of Canfield, as counsel for the people contend. Motive precedes intention, and is the cause or reason upon which it is formed; and, if this testimony clearly tended to show a pre-existing motive for the killing of Canfield, it would be admissible as tending to show that the homicide was not accidental, but was intentional and premeditated. I have assumed that counsel used the word "motive" in the sense of "intention." But it is obvious that an intention to do an act may exist without any known or ascertainable motive for its existence; and hence, where "intention" is apparent, or may otherwise be shown, it is not necessary to prove a motive. The contention of the respondent here would oblige the court and the jury to infer, from an intention to kill Coleman, in no wise manifested save by the act of shooting at him, a pre-existing intention to kill Canfield. I can see no clear, logical, or even possible ground upon which such inference could be based, other than that shown by his willingness and moral capacity to commit another offense; and all the authorities agree that such evidence cannot be admitted for that purpose. How an intention which may be, and often is, instantaneously formed, and the existence of which is only shown by a single instantaneous act, can be adopted as a predicate from which an inference can be logically drawn that it existed at any specified time prior to such manifestation, I do not comprehend. That it may have existed before is conceded; but that it did exist before, the subsequent fact does not either logically or clearly tend to prove. Actual or specific intentions, as controlling or prompting action, are largely the creatures of circumstance and opportunity, and are thereby created or changed; while motive, as used in criminal law, implies an evil disposition, and willingness to injure, which may exist without any specific intention to injure at all, or to injure in any specific manner; and because of this distinction collateral evidence may often be both relevant and competent to prove motive, which is comparatively permanent and constant, while it would be neither relevant nor competent to show intention as an isolated fact. But to sustain the admission of this evidence we must go further than to hold that it is competent to prove an intention to kill Canfield, since the killing may have been voluntary,—intentional,—and yet have been only manslaughter; while here the verdict was of murder in the first degree, which required a finding not only of an intention to kill, but that it was deliberate, premeditated, and malicious; and, if deliberation and premeditation were not shown by the facts occurring in the house, or by acts preceding them, it could not be shown by the subsequent facts disclosed by the evidence objected to.

Appellant further contends that the court erred in its instruction to the jury upon the subject of his intoxication. The instruction excepted to gave the whole of section 22 of the Penal Code. The part of the instruction excepted to is as follows: "No act committed by a person while in a state of voluntary intoxication is less criminal by reason of his having been in such condition." This language, though copied from section 22, if it had been given alone, would have been erroneous, because it omitted that portion of the section which qualified it in cases where the actual existence of an intention was a necessary element of the offense. But it was proper to include the part objected to, not only because it was a part of an entire section upon that subject, but because the information included the offense of manslaughter, to which the part objected to was applicable.

I think the jury were not misled or prejudiced by the use of the words "crime committed," in another instruction, though the word "homicide" would have been better in that connection.

As the other questions argued by appellant will not necessarily arise upon a new trial of this case, they need not be noticed. I think the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PEOPLE v. CROWL. (No. 20,965.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1893.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS—INTENTION—DUTY OF JURY.

1. An instruction, in a prosecution for assault with intent to commit rape, that a presumption is a deduction which the law expressly directs to be made from particular facts, and unless this is controverted by other facts the presumption will control, and that among such presumptions is one that an unlawful act was done with an unlawful intent, is proper, the instruction not relating to deductions of fact to be drawn by the jury.

2. An instruction that an intention is manifested by the circumstances connected with the offense, and the sound mind and discretion of the accused, does not assume any fact.

3. Instructions telling the jury of their duty to convict if the evidence satisfies them of defendant's guilt, though not erroneous, are better omitted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; C. L. Clafin, Judge.

J. G. Crowl was convicted of assault with intent to rape, and appeals. Affirmed.

Goodwin & Stewart and W. N. Goodwin, for appellant. E. E. Copeland, D. W. Jenks, and Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

SEARLS, C. J. G. Crowl, the appellant, was indicted for the crime of an assault with intent to commit rape upon one Ida Trybschenck, a female child under 10 years of age, and upon trial was convicted as charged. The appeal is from the judgment, and the cause comes up on the judgment roll, without any bill of exceptions. At the trial the court, at the request of the prosecution, among other instructions to the jury, gave the following: "No. 3. A presumption is a deduction which the law expressly directs to be made from particular facts; and, unless this presumption is controverted by other facts, the jury is bound to find according to such presumption. Among such presumptions are the following: (1) That an unlawful act was done with an unlawful intent.

* * * No. 4. An intention is manifested by the circumstances connected with the offense, and the sound mind and discretion of the accused. All persons are of sound mind who are neither idiots nor lunatics, nor affected with insanity. No. 5. The jurors are the sole judges of all questions of fact, and of the credibility of witnesses. But you are not at liberty to disbelieve the evidence as jurors, if you believe it as men. You are not to throw aside any considerations connected with the testimony, which would be brought to bear in your judgment as men, simply because you are now jurors. While you are to be prudent and cautious, and to give the defendant the benefit of every reasonable doubt, you are not to hesitate in the performance of your duty by reason of any peculiar method of considering testimony or evidence, which you may think belongs to you as jurymen, but which would not belong to you as men. If you are entirely satisfied from the evidence of the guilt of the defendant, your verdict should be 'Guilty.' * * * No. 7. If the evidence entirely satisfies you of the guilt of the defendant, you can have no choice, but must find him guilty. Following the pathway of the evidence, you can turn neither to the right nor to the left, but must accept the conclusions to which the facts lead; and you should remember that it is not the juror, but the law, that inflicts the punishment. * * * No. 9. If the facts entirely satisfy you of the defendant's guilt, you must convict him. In such case no consideration of pity or mercy can influence you. With the consequences which may attend conviction you have nothing to do. They rest upon others." Appellant argues that these instructions do not correctly enunciate the law as applicable to the case.

Instruction No. 3 is taken almost bodily from sections 1959, 1961, and subdivision 2 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and was alike law and applicable to the case in hand. The instruction did not relate to deductions of fact which are to be drawn by the jury, but to presumptions of law which come within the province of the court. The instruction is not inimical to the doctrine of People v. Walden, 51 Cal. 589; Stone v. Mining Co., 52 Cal. 318; and Scott v. Wood, 81 Cal. 405, 22 Pac. 871.

The fourth instruction, as to intention, was correct, and did not, as appellant argues, assume any fact. It embodied a legal principle applicable to all persons charged with crime.

The fifth, seventh, and ninth instructions related mainly to the duties of jurors in the consideration of criminal cases. Unless there is an apparent necessity therefor, it would seem better in all cases for the prosecution to rely upon the good sense of jurors to do their duty under such circumstances, subject to such explanations as to the scope of their responsibilities as may properly come within its sphere in the argument of the cause. The tendency to ask too many instructions, on the part of the prosecution, is everywhere apparent. We cannot say the instructions now under consideration are positively erroneous, but, at the same time, think it would have been better to have omitted them.

The tenth instruction, which we have not set out, is an exact copy of the instruction given in People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 195, in relation to the effect to be given to the testimony of a defendant when a witness in his own behalf, and found on pages 195 and 196 of that case. The objection to this instruction has been often made, and as often overruled. It matters not what our views would be on the subject, were the question here for the first time. Repeated adjudications have placed it beyond the realm of discussion. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

THELIN v. STEWART et al. (No. 19,234.)

PLEADING—COMPLAINT—MISJOINDER OF CAUSES OF ACTION—APPEAL—OBJECTIONS WAIVED.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 427, authorizes plaintiff to "unite several causes of action in the same complaint where they all arise out of * * * (6) injuries to person; (7) injuries to property," and provides that "the causes of action so united must all belong to only one of these classes." Held, that plaintiff cannot join in the same complaint a cause of action for forcing the noxious fumes of chemicals into plaintiff's shop, to the injury of his health, and a cause of action for breaking into the shop and removing his personal property.

2. Defendant does not waive his demurrer for misjoinder of causes by answering the complaint, and going to trial on the merits, after the demurrer has been improperly overruled.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Action by Thelin against Stewart and others for injuries to person and property. Defendants demur. Demurrer overruled. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. T. McNealy, for appellants. J. S. Callen and Isaac G. Burnett, (Callen & Neale, of counsel,) for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff seeks to recover damages from the defendants for injuries sustained by him from their wrongful acts. The complaint is in two counts, each of which is stated to be "a separate cause of action" against the defendants. In his first cause of action he alleges that during the whole of the 25th, 26th, 27th, and 28th days of July, 1892, the said defendants, and each of them, willfully and maliciously burned sulphur and other disagreeably smelling chemicals in a room adjacent to the room occupied by plaintiff as his shop, and in which the plaintiff was at the said time conducting his business, in such a manner as to purposely cause the said fumes from said sulphur and other chemicals to enter the said shop of plaintiff, and thereby the air in said shop was vitiated to such an extent that it was impossible to remain in said shop, and the life of said plaintiff was by said vitiated condition of said air in said shop endangered, and his health was thereby seriously affected. In the second cause of action the plaintiff alleges that during the night of the 28th day of July, 1892, the said defendants, and each of them, broke open the door of his shop, and removed therefrom all of the personal property in said shop, and deposited the same upon the edge of the sidewalk, and allowed the property to remain there during the 29th day of July, until about 5 o'clock P. M., when it was removed by said defendants without his knowledge, and to some place unknown to him. For each of these separate causes of action the plaintiff alleges that he sustained damage in the sum of $2,500, and asks judgment for their aggregate, amounting to $5,000. The defendants demurred to the complaint upon the ground that the several causes of action were improperly united therein, the court overruled their demurrer, and thereafter they answered, and upon the trial of the cause judgment was rendered against them for the sum of $650. From this judgment they have appealed upon the judgment roll alone, upon the ground that their demurrer was improperly overruled. Section 427, Code Civil Proc., authorizes the plaintiff to unite in the same complaint several causes of action, "where they all arise out of * * *

(6) injuries to person; (7) injuries to property;" but the same section also declares that "the causes of action so united must all belong to only one of these classes." The cause of action set forth in the first count of the complaint is for an injury to the person of the plaintiff, while that which is set forth in the second count is for an injury to his property; and, in addition to being alleged to be "a separate cause of action," appears from the facts alleged to have arisen subsequent to the occurrence of the facts set forth in the first count. For this reason, therefore, the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained.

The defendants did not waive their demurrer by subsequently answering the complaint, and going to trial upon the merits. The plaintiff was forbidden by the statute from uniting two causes of action in his complaint, and the objection was not waived by the defendants in submitting to a trial of the issues. A judgment rendered upon a complaint after a demurrer thereto has been improperly overruled, must be reversed, unless it clearly appears that no injury to the defendant resulted therefrom. Injury will be presumed from the error, and it is incumbent upon the respondent to make it appear to the contrary. The defense to the different causes of action herein might be different, and also require proof of different character. It is sufficient, however, to say that the statute has expressly declared that the two causes of action shall not be united in the same complaint. Reynolds v. Lincoln, 71 Cal. 190, 9 Pac. 176, and 12 Pac. 449; Stark v. Wellman, 96 Cal. 400, 31 Pac. 259; Mallory v. Thomas, 98 Cal. 644, 33 Pac. 757. The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. RONEY. (No. 20,990.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 29, 1893.)

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; E. D. Ham, Judge.

William Roney was convicted of assault with intent to commit rape, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Dennis Spencer and John T. York, for appellant. Henry C. Gesford, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of the crime of assault with intent to commit rape, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for a term of years. This appeal is taken by him from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial. It is contended by appellant that the judgment should be reversed—First, because of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict; second, because the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions requested by the defendant; third, errors of law occurring at the trial.

As the evidence upon which the defendant was convicted fully sustains the verdict, the first ground of objection, with respect to its insufficiency, cannot be sustained. Nor is it necessary to consider the questions embraced in the ground of objection relating to the alleged errors of law occurring at the trial, further than to say that they are either untenable or immaterial. The remaining questions which we are asked to consider refer to the instructions requested by the defendant and refused by the court. An examination of the record with reference to these questions shows that the instructions requested by the defendant and refused were all substantially embodied in the charge of the court and the instructions given at the request of the defendant; and, as the jury was fully charged by the court on all matters of law necessary for their information, it follows that the judgment and order should be affirmed. So ordered.

WILLS—CONTEST—MENTAL CAPACITY—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 1881, subd. 4, providing that a physician cannot, without consent of the patient, be examined as to any information acquired in attending the patient, necessary to enable him to act, cannot be waived by a contesting heir as against the proponent widow, so that a physician, in a will contest based on testator's incapacity, can testify that he prescribed for testator for mental trouble.

2. A will contest is a civil action, within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 1881, subd. 4, providing that in such action a medical man cannot, without the patient's consent, be examined as to any information necessarily acquired in attending him.

3. A question as to the mental soundness, to be inferred from a certain physical condition hypothetically stated, is not objectionable because the expert has already testified, as testator's physician, that such was in fact testator's physical condition.

4. It is not competent, on the issue of undue influence on the part of the proponent widow, to show that nine years before the will was made, and six years before their marriage, testator having then another wife, he and proponent went together on a camping trip, proponent being introduced as his wife.

5. When contestant has closed his case without offering any evidence as to the value of the estate, it is error to exclude evidence offered by proponent on the subject.

6. The nurse's record of what transpired at testator's sick bed, in her presence, is not competent evidence, the nurse being present and able to testify herself.

Department one. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. H. Levy, Judge.

Appeal of Annie Flint, widow of William C. Flint, deceased, and proponent of his alleged will, from a judgment denying probate thereof. Reversed.

Cal. Rep. 32-34 P.—63

Frank M. Stone and F. W. Reade, for appellant. Welles Whitmore, for respondent. Wm. F. Gibson, for Greene, special administrator.

GAROUTTE, J. A judgment was entered denying probate to a certain instrument claimed to be the last will and testament of William C. Flint, deceased, upon the ground that at the time said instrument was signed the testator was not of sound and disposing mind, and also that said deceased was unduly influenced in the making thereof. The appellant, Annie Flint, wife of the deceased, made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is prosecuted from the order denying such motion.

The appeal is based upon certain rulings of the court in the admission and rejection of evidence offered during the progress of the trial; also complaint is made of certain instructions of law which were given to the jury. The bill of exceptions is a model in its manner of preparation, containing sufficient evidence to fully yet succinctly point the objections made, and being such as is contemplated by the statute, but forming the exception to the general rule of those placed before us. Dr. McLean, having stated that he was the attending physician of the deceased for several days prior to his death, was allowed to testify, under the objection of appellant, that during his visitations he prescribed for him for mental trouble. Subdivision 4 of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "A licensed physician or surgeon cannot, without the consent of his patient, be examined in a civil action as to any information acquired in attending the patient which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient." Under this provision the testimony of the doctor that he prescribed for his patient for mental trouble should not have gone to the jury. It came clearly within the scope of the foregoing provision, and it is evident that the patient was not present at the trial to give his consent to its admission. The authorities are uniform upon this question in all those states possessing statutory enactments in any way similar to the one we have quoted. See Briggs v. Briggs, 20 Mich. 34; Streeter v. City of Breckenridge, 23 Mo. App. 244; Freel v. Railway Co., 97 Cal. 40, 31 Pac. 730. Counsel for respondent concedes the force of the above authorities, and also concedes that the evidence was objectionable under the provision of our statute; but insists that the privilege may be waived, not only by the patient, but by his heirs and legal representatives. The child of the deceased is here the contestant of the will, and by offering the evidence of the physician waived the privilege, provided that under the law of this state the power vested in her to make such waiver. The question of waiver of the privilege by the personal representative or heir of the deceased is a new one in this state, but the statute of New York bearing upon this matter is similar to the provision of our Code of Civil Procedure, and the decisions of the courts of that state furnish us ample light in the form of precedent. The Code of Civil Procedure of New York (section 836) provides that the privilege is present unless "expressly waived by the patient." The California provision contains the words, "without the consent of his patient." It will thus be seen that the provisions are, in effect, the same. The courts of New York, under this clause of the statute, have uniformly held that the patient alone can waive the privilege, and when such patient is dead the matter is forever closed. Westover v. Insurance Co., 99 N. Y. 56, 1 N. E. 104; Renihan v. Dennin, 103 N. Y. 573, 9 N. E. 320; Loder v. Whelpley, 111 N. Y. 239, 13 N. E. 874. The decisions of the appellate courts of Michigan, Missouri, and Indiana support respondent's position in this regard. Morris v. Morris, 119 Ind. 341, 21 N. E. 918; Groll v. Tower, 85 Mo. 249; Thompson v. Ish, 99 Mo. 160, 12 S. W. 510; Fraser v. Jennison, 42 Mich. 206, 3 N. W. 882. But the statutes of those states regarding privileged communications vary quite materially from those of New York and California, and, as is said in Thompson v. Ish, supra: "The difference in the statutes may well cause the difference in the rule laid down in New York and Missouri."

Under the facts of this case we are not called upon to even apply the strict rule laid down by the New York authorities. The contest here arises upon the probate of a will as between the surviving widow, a devisee thereunder, and the heir, a child of the deceased by a former marriage. As yet there is no personal representative in the case, as no executor or administrator has been appointed. The cases cited from various states, with the exception of Thompson v. Ish, only go to the extent of the right of the personal representative to waive the privilege. In this case we have no personal representative, and the contest arises between the devisee and the heir. All of the courts concede the privilege does not lapse with death, hence it is coupled with the evidence when offered at the trial. Who has the power to waive it? Can the heir waive it, as against the objection of the devisee? That is the thing done in this case, and we think the action of the court cannot be sustained. It cannot be said that the heir is representing the deceased, for the heir is attempting to overthrow the will, and offers this evidence of the attending physician, over which the privilege rests, for the very purpose of attacking the mental soundness of the patient. Such is not the representative of the deceased referred to in the various decisions of the courts. This provision of law rests upon a sound public policy. Its object and purpose is to enable the patient to make a full statement of his physical infirmities to his physician, with the knowledge that the law recognizes the communications as confidential, and guards against the possibility of his feelings being shocked or his reputation tarnished by their subsequent disclosure. To him the considerations are even more weighty that the privilege remain inviolate after he has gone to his grave, for his good name is left behind deprived of his protecting care. His rights are not buried in the grave, and heirs and devisees quarreling among themselves over a division of his patrimony in justice to his memory should not be allowed to waive the privilege.

The attending physician, Dr. McLean, while upon the witness stand, was also asked a hypothetical question as to his opinion, as an expert, of the patient's mental soundness, based upon a state of facts describing the deceased's physical condition, as testified to by the doctor himself. The question asked was purely hypothetical, and we think the objection thereto was properly overruled. The fact that the condition of the patient, as described in the question, was personally known to the witness, is immaterial. He was questioned as an expert upon matters presented to him in the abstract, and his opinion in either case would necessarily be the same, for the state of facts was the same.

As evidence tending to prove undue influence upon the part of the devisee, Mrs. Flint, in the execution of the will, the contestant, under objection, proved that, in the summer of 1882, Mrs. Flint, then Miss Annie Gorsig, accompanied the deceased upon a camping excursion, and at that time was introduced as Mrs. Flint. The purpose and tendency of this evidence was to establish illicit relations between these parties, and, viewed in that light, it must have prejudiced appellant's cause in the minds of the jury. The will was executed nine years after this event, and, standing alone as an isolated circumstance, disconnected with any chain of subsequent events passing down to the time of its execution tending to show an exercise of undue influence by appellant upon the testator's mind, we think the evidence objectionable, as entirely too remote to reach the only object for which it could be admissible, to wit, as tending to show undue influence. At that time the testator was not divorced from his first wife. He was not married to his present wife until six years later, and the will was not executed until three years subsequent to this marriage. The only effect the testimony could have had was to besmirch the character of appellant, and her character was not an issue in the case. While a court is allowed a liberal discretion in admitting evidence as to the relations existing between the deceased and the party charged to have exercised the undue influence, yet an isolated circumstance, such as is depicted by this evidence, wholly fails in enlightening the jury upon the question. The testimony of McDonald and Paine, as to appellant being in the company of the testator, upon two other occasions, we think immaterial. It is scarcely sufficient even to justify an inference of unlawful relations between the parties. The rule is well settled that a woman living in illicit relations with a testator at the time he executes his will is not allowed to exercise her influence in the execution thereof to the extent that a wife is entitled. But here the evidence offered is isolated circumstances, entirely disconnected, as far as the record discloses, with events surrounding the latter years of the testator's life; and, beyond all this, the woman was his lawful wife at the time of the execution of the will, and had been such for three years prior thereto. Conceding indiscretions to have been committed by these parties at this time, such evidence wholly failed to show any undue influence at a time many years after, for in the interim the parties were married, and she had been a lawful wife for years. The foregoing views are fully supported in Webber v. Sullivan, 58 Iowa, 260, 12 N. W. 319; Batchelder v. Batchelder, 139 Mass. 1, 29 N. E. 61; Pierce v. Pierce, 38 Mich. 418.

Contestant closed his case without offering any evidence as to the value of testator's estate. Evidence bearing on the question was then offered by the surviving widow, but under objection was ruled out. The ruling was erroneous. It is well settled that the amount and condition of the testator's estate is always an element to be taken into consideration in determining the mental capacity of the testator, and the influences which actuated his mind in disposing of his property. If it is good evidence for the contestants of a will, for the purpose of showing that the devises and bequests to his beneficiaries are unreasonable and unjust, as compared to the value of his estate and his relationship to the parties, thus indicating mental incapacity or undue influence, it is equally good evidence in favor of the supporters of the will for the purpose of showing a fair and reasonable allotment of his property to the parties entitled to his bounty, as indicating mental soundness, and a mind entirely free from all improper influences.

The tenth paragraph of testator's will reads: "I give, devise, and bequeath to Arthur Joshua * * *. The witness Mason testified that when the will was signed he called the testator's attention to this omission, and the deceased then said to let it go; that if he made a codicil he would then put something in the codicil for him. As bearing upon this matter, the court gave the following instruction: "Again, if you find from the evidence in this case that testator, William C. Flint, on said 5th day of January, 1891, when he signed said proposed will, omitted from the provisions thereof bequests which he desired to make, the court instructs you that said proposed will was incomplete, and not the complete will of said testator, William C. Flint, and not his will." The instruction is erroneous; but, inasmuch as no issue was presented to the jury embodying the matter embraced within the instruction, the error would seem to be harmless.

Mrs. Lizzie Haggard was the nurse of the deceased at the time he executed his will, and she kept a record of the events transpiring at his sick bed while she was present. Upon cross-examination, contestant, under objection, offered this record in evidence. Its admission should not have been allowed. There was no question involved as to the right of the witness to refresh her recollection from the record, but it was offered as an independent piece of evidence in the case. It is difficult to see the purpose of the offer, for the witness was upon the stand, ready to testify as to all competent and material matters occurring at the times she was engaged in the sick room. A contest arising upon the probate of a will is a civil action, within the meaning of subdivision 4 of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Neither can we give the stipulation entered into by the respective attorneys the scope and force contended for it by respondent's counsel. The order denying a new trial is reversed, and the cause remanded.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — PETITION TO SELL LAND FOR DEBTS — EVIDENCE—RES JUDICATA.

1. When, on petition to sell land of deceased for the payment of debts, notice is given to persons interested as provided by Code Civil Proc. § 1539, and thereafter an order refusing such sale is reversed on appeal, and the proceeding remanded for a new trial, the notice required by said section need not be again given; but the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may dispose of the petition on such notice as may be provided by its general rules, or as it may deem reasonable, provided the parties interested are not deprived of a hearing.

2. An order settling an executor's account, allowing a claim included therein, of a third person, for services rendered the estate, and adjudging that there is no money in the executor's hands to pay such claim, is conclusive on devisees not under disability, who do not appeal, and they cannot attack it on an application for the sale of land to pay such claim.

3. On an application for the sale of decedent's land to pay a claim for services to the estate, an agreement between the devisees made prior to the performance of such services, and fixing a certain sum as then due the administratrix on the settlement of account, is inadmissible.

4. On a petition for the sale of decedent's land to pay a debt due petitioner, a claim that the debt had been paid by petitioner's use and occupation of a portion of the estate is a counterclaim, which must be pleaded.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Petition by Cave J. Coutts for the sale of real estate belonging to the estate of Cave J. Coutts, deceased. From an order granting the petition, contestants appeal. Affirmed.

Trippet, Boone & Neale, for appellants. Conklin & Hughes, George J. Leovy, and Leovy & Palmer, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Upon the former appeal herein, (87 Cal. 480, 25 Pac. 685,) it was held that the petition for the order of sale was sufficient, and that determination is conclusive of the question upon the present appeal. The subsequent permission of the court below to allow Mrs. Dear to file objections to granting an order of sale does not give her any right to renew the objections to the sufficiency of the petition. By the proper publication of the order to show cause why the petition should not be granted, she was brought within the jurisdiction of the court, and was bound by its action as fully by her default for not appearing as if she had appeared and contested the sufficiency of the petition, and the determination by this court upon an appeal from that order was equally binding upon her. We do not, however, wish to be understood as intimating that the petition is in any respect defective, but to show that the question cannot be regarded as open for discussion.

It was not necessary for the court below, after our reversal of its former order, to again give the notice required by section 1539, Code Civil Proc. By the original compliance with the requirements of that section, it had obtained jurisdiction in the matter, and over all parties interested therein; and its subsequent action upon the petition was a movement within its jurisdiction, to be reversed only for some error in law which might be shown upon a direct appeal. After the remittitur had been filed therein, that court was at liberty to hear and dispose of the petition upon such notice as might be provided by its general rules, or as it might deem reasonable in the particular case; and unless it should be made to appear that it had abused its discretion in this respect, or that the parties entitled thereto had been prevented from hearing, its action is not to be set aside. No claim of surprise, or inability to properly present their objections, was made herein, but the only objection to a hearing was the want of the statutory notice aforesaid, and this, as we have seen, was not required.

May 29, 1889, the executrix filed her account of receipts and disbursements on account of the estate from the 29th of January, 1887, to the 9th of May, 1889, and of all sums of money belonging to the said estate which had come into her hands as such executrix, and in the report accompanying her account stated that the respondent herein, and some others, had claims against her as executrix, the validity of which, as charges against the said estate, she asked the court to determine. Upon proper notice therefor, this account was settled September 6, 1889, and in the order settling the account the court found that she had expended all the money that had been received by her as executrix, together with $315.03 in addition, for which she was entitled to credit, and also that the claim of the respondent herein for $1,240.57, mentioned in the report accompanying her account, was a legal charge against the estate, and she was directed to pay the same out of the moneys of said estate which might thereafter come into her hands as such executrix. At the hearing herein upon the petition for the order of sale, the contestants sought to show that the claim of the respondent had been paid and discharged prior to the filing of the foregoing account, but the court refused to allow any evidence to be given in support thereof. This ruling was correct. It was said upon the former appeal herein: "The order settling the account was appealable, and the allowance of the claim is conclusive against every one interested, except those laboring under disability." The offer of the appellants was to impeach the correctness of the judgment after it had become final.

The contestants offered in evidence an agreement entered into January 29, 1887, between all of the heirs of the decedent, for the division between themselves of a portion of the estate of the decedent, and for the sale of certain other property of the estate, and the disposition of its proceeds. This agreement provided that, of the proceeds of said sale, there should be paid "the sum of $6,000 to Ysidora B. de Coutts, in the amount agreed to be due to her on the settlement of her accounts as executrix of the estate of Cave J. Coutts, deceased." The contestants then offered to show by one of the parties to this agreement that at the time it was executed this sum of $6,000 was estimated as the probable cost of closing the administration, and was accordingly inserted in said agreement, and also that at the time of the allowance of the respondent's claim there was $1,800 remaining in the hands of the executrix, and available for the costs of the administration, and that it was still in her hands, subject to disposal as the court might direct. This evidence was also excluded by the court, and its ruling is assigned as error. The agreement in question was executed more than two years prior to the filing of the account of the executrix, and that account, in its terms, purported to relate to matters "subsequent to the date of said agreement," and extending over a period of upwards of two years. The clause in the agreement itself, which the contestants relied upon as the basis of their offer, had reference to a period anterior to the agreement, as it refers to an amount then agreed to be already due to the executrix on the settlement of her account; and the agreement also provides that, upon the coming of age of one of the heirs, she should take the necessary steps to have the administration of the estate closed. The items forming the claim of the respondent are not shown by the record, nor are their respective dates given; but annexed to the account of the executrix, which was filed in May, 1889, is a statement of her account with him, in which it appears that a balance was struck between the items June 1, 1888, and that on that date an entry was made in the account as follows: "Balance due C. J. Coutts, $1,240.57." From all that appears from the record, therefore, the several items of this claim must be assumed to have been incurred subsequent to the execution of the agreement, and consequently not to have been included therein. Even if we could assume that the sum of $6,000 inserted in the agreement was intended to cover the future expenses of administration, it was incumbent upon the contestants, when the validity of this claim was brought before the court by the executrix in 1889, to show that that sum was intended to include this claim, and that it was sufficient therefor, and that enough to discharge the same then remained in the hands of the executrix. The judgment of the court that there was no money then in her hands belonging to the estate, and that the claim of the respondent was a legal charge against the estate, was a determination in her favor, that there was no money in her hands, and in favor of the respondent, that his claim was a valid charge against the estate, and must be treated as conclusive upon these points. The offer of the contestants to show that, at the time the court made this order, there was the sum of $1,800 in her hands, was an attempt to contradict the direct judgment of the court that at that time she had no money of the estate in her hands; and the offer to show that this amount of money still remained in her hands was equally an attempt to impeach the correctness of that judgment. It is not claimed, nor was any offer made to show, that she had received any moneys belonging to the estate since the settlement of that account.

The offer to show that the claim of the petitioner had been paid by reason of his having had the use and occupation of a portion of the estate, for which he should account in a sum equivalent to the amount of his claim, was properly excluded. No issue of this kind was presented to the court, and the claim, if valid, was in the nature of a counterclaim, which should have been pleaded. Even if the facts had been admitted, it would not constitute a payment. Borland v. Bank, 99 Cal. 94, 33 Pac. 737. The order is affirmed.

LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION—TO WHOM GRANTED —FOREIGN WILL.

Under Code Civil Proc. pt. 3, tit. 11, c. 2, art. 3, entitled "Probate of Foreign Wills," and providing that an authenticated copy of the will and of its probate in any foreign country or state "shall be produced by the executor or other person interested in the will, with a petition for letters," and that after proper notice and proofs, there shall be "letters testamentary, or of administration, issued thereon," letters of administration must, in the absence of a petition by the executors, be granted to a person "interested in the will," who applies for them, to the exclusion of the public administrator.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Petition for Thomas I. Bergin for the admission to probate of the will of Daniel J. Bergin, deceased, and for letters of administration thereon. From an order granting the petition, A. C. Freese, public administrator, appeals. Affirmed.

H. Choynski, for appellant. Thos. I. Bergin, in pro. per.

McFARLAND, J. Daniel J. Bergin, deceased, died in March, 1892, in the city of Dublin, Ireland, leaving a last will, which was duly probated in the proper court of that country. He left some personal property in the city and county of San Francisco, Cal. By said will certain persons were appointed executors, and the respondent herein, Thomas I. Bergin, who is a citizen and resident of San Francisco, in the state of California, was named as a devisee. The said respondent produced and filed with the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco an authenticated copy of said will and probate, together with a petition that the same be admitted to probate here, and that letters of administration with the will annexed be issued to him. Afterwards, A. C. Freese, public administrator of said city and county, also filed a petition for the probate of said will, and for the issuance of letters of administration to him. The court, after a hearing of both petitions, admitted the will to probate, ordered that letters be granted to said Thomas I. Bergin, and denied the petition of Freese; and from these orders Freese appeals.

We are satisfied that the ruling of the lower court was correct. The part of the Code which governs this case is found in article 3, c. 2, tit. 11, pt. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, embracing sections 1322 to 1324, inclusive, under the head of "Probate of Foreign Wills." It is there provided that an authenticated copy of the will and of its probate in the foreign country "shall be produced by the executor or other person interested in the will, with a petition for letters;" and that, after proper notice and proofs, there shall be "letters testamentary, or of administration, issued thereon." Said article 3 deals specially with the subject-matter of foreign wills, and it must prevail over all conflicting provisions "as to all matters and questions arising out of the subject-matter of such article." Pol. Code, § 4483. By that chapter it is clearly provided that letters testamentary must be granted to the executor upon his petition, for letters testamentary could be granted only to an executor; and we think it also clear that under the provisions of said chapter letters "of administration" must be granted to a "person interested in the will" who applies for them, in the absence of a petition by the executors. None of the cases relied on by appellant involved in any way a foreign will, except Estate of Beach, 63 Cal. 458, and Estate of Garber, 74 Cal. 338, 16 Pac. 233; and the only matter passed upon in those cases was the general right of a non-resident to nominate an administrator. The very question involved in the case at bar was not before the court in those cases, because here the respondent, who applied in his own right, was a citizen and resident in California; and there was no reference in the opinions of the court in those cases to said chapter 3, or any discussion of the point at issue in the case at bar. We do not desire, however, to have this opinion taken as assuming that a public administrator would, under any circumstances, be entitled to letters of administration in a case of a foreign will. That matter was clearly not in the mind of the court in any of the cases cited; and whether or not the general provisions of the Code about public administrators refer only to the estates of persons dying in their counties, and to domestic wills, must be considered an open question. Orders appealed from affirmed.

KNIGHT et ux. v. PACIFIC COAST STAGE CO. (No. 19,228.)

CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—EVIDENCE OF NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action by a passenger against a stage company for personal injuries received from the upsetting of a stage in coming down a mountain road, it appeared that one of the horses had been inclined to run away; that the road was muddy and slippery; that the horses were going at "a slow jog," when they were frightened by a landslide; that they ran 100 yards before the driver regained control; that flying mud and slush made it hard for the driver to see, and tended to frighten the horses; and that the horses were going in a trot, when they were so frightened by another slide that the driver lost control, and they ran away, and upset the stage. Held, that there was evidence for the jury as to whether defendant failed to provide suitable horses and driver.

2. Where the only issues were as to the suitability of the horses and driver, the court properly refused to instruct concerning latent defects in the stage, and concerning the duty of the injured party to exercise proper care in endeavoring to recover from the injury.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action by William G. Knight and wife against the Pacific Coast Stage Company for personal injuries to the wife. From a judgment entered on a verdict for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Graves & Graves, for appellant. Wilcoxon & Bouldin and J. M. Wilcoxon, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiffs were being carried as passengers in one of the coaches of the defendant, on the night of December 30, 1891, from Santa Margarita to San Luis Obispo; and, while going down the slope of the mountain towards the latter place, and about three miles therefrom, the coach was upset, and Mrs. Knight sustained serious injuries, for which this action was brought. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $1,000, and from the judgment entered thereon, and an order denying a new trial, the defendants have appealed.

It was shown at the trial that it had rained very hard on the previous night, and that on the night in question the road was muddy and slippery; that after reaching the top of the mountain, and while going down, after turning a certain bend in the road, the horses attached to the coach were frightened by a slide of rocks and earth, and ran about 100 yards before they were got under control, and were then driven along until they were frightened by another slide, after which the driver lost all control of them, and, after running about three-quarters of a mile, the coach was upset. It is contended by the appellant that the evidence in the case failed to show any negligence on its part, for the reason that the accident was the result of a casualty which could not have been foreseen or guarded against, and that for this reason the verdict should have been in its favor. There was, however, evidence before the jury tending to show that one of the horses attached to the coach had been inclined to run away; and, although the bill of exceptions does not show the speed at which the horses were driven down the mountain, the driver testified that from the top of the mountain down to the bend where the first slide was encountered he was going at a "slow jog," and that, after their first fright, they ran about 100 yards, when he got them under control, so that they went in a trot. He also testified that the road was slushy and wet, and that mud was flying, so that he could hardly see anything, and that this would have a tendency to scare the horses. The court instructed the jury very fully upon the propositions of law involved in the case, and left to them to determine whether the injury to the plaintiff was caused through any negligence of the defendant, or was the result of an unavoidable accident. Under the circumstances attendant upon the passage down the mountain it was incumbent upon the driver to exercise more than ordinary care, and we cannot say that there was no evidence before the jury in support of the plaintiffs' claim that the defendant was negligent in providing suitable horses, or in the manner in which they were driven.

The court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury that the defendant was not liable for any latent defect in its coach which could not be discovered by the most careful examination, or by any known test. There was no issue of this nature in the case. The charge of negligence against the defendant in the complaint is in its failure to provide a suitable driver and suitable horses for said coach, and there had been no evidence introduced respecting the insufficiency of the coach. For a similar reason the court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury respecting the duty of Mrs. Knight to exercise proper care in endeavoring to recover from the accident. No evidence was before the jury tending to show that she had in any particular failed in this respect. The judgment and order are affirmed.

FINNERTY et al. v. PENNIE et al. (No. 15,286.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 6, 1893.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION—CONSTRUCTION.

1. A decree, on petition of an administrator, for final distribution of an estate "subject to the claim of said administrator for the sum of $834.90," creates a lien for that amount on the property in his favor.

2. M. left as his heir C., who afterwards died, leaving defendants as his heirs. K. was appointed administrator of both estates, and on settlement of M.'s estate it was decreed that it should be distributed to K. as the administrator of C.'s estate, subject to K.'s claim for a certain amount found due him as administrator of M.'s estate. Held, that defendants took M.'s estate subject to the lien created by this decree.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Partition by William H. Finnerty and another against James C. Pennie, Margaret O'Neill, and Mary A. Connors, and Thomas Kirkpatrick. Judgment was entered that the property sought to be partitioned be sold, and that the interests of O'Neill and Connors were subject to a lien in favor of Kirkpatrick for services performed by him as administrator of their interests in such property. From an order denying their motion for a new trial on the ground that the court erred in allowing Kirkpatrick's claim, and declaring it a lien on their interests, O'Neill and Connors appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. D. Collins, for appellants. Thos. F. Barry, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. In January, 1889, Matthew Connors died, owning an undivided one-half interest in certain real property situate in the city and county of San Francisco, and leaving as his sole heir at law his father, Michael Connors. In June, 1889, Michael Connors also died, leaving as his sole heirs at law two daughters, Margaret O'Neill and Mary A. Connors. In November, 1889, Thomas Kirkpatrick was duly appointed administrator of the estate of each of the said decedents by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and thereafter he duly qualified and entered upon the discharge of his duties as such. In May, 1890, the said administrator rendered and filed in court a full account and report of his administration of each of the said estates, and accompanied the same with petitions for the final distribution thereof. These accounts were settled and allowed by the court, and in the matter of the estate of Matthew Connors, on the 16th of September following, it was ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the undivided one-half of the said real property belonging to that estate be distributed to Thomas Kirkpatrick as administrator of the estate of Michael Connors, "subject to the claim of the said administrator for the sum of $834.90, as fixed by the order settling the said account" in the first-named estate. And in the matter of the estate of Michael Connors it was on the same day ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the undivided one-half interest in the said real property be distributed in equal shares to Margaret O'Neill and Mary A. Connors, "subject to the claim of said administrator, amounting to the sum of $271, as fixed by the order settling the said account herein." In January, 1891, the plaintiffs William H. Finnerty and Edward Finnerty, being the owners of the other undivided one-half of the said real property, commenced this action against Margaret O'Neill, Mary A. Connors, Thomas Kirkpatrick, and others, for a partition of the property, or, if a partition could not be made without injury to the owners, then for a sale thereof, and a division of the proceeds. The case was tried, and the court found, among other things, that the plaintiffs and the two defendants first named were the owners each of an undivided one-fourth of the said described property, and that the same was so situated and built upon that it could not be partitioned. The court further found "that the defendant Thomas Kirkpatrick, as administrator of the estate of Matthew Connors, deceased, has a claim, lien, and charge against the respective interests of said Margaret O'Neill and Mary A. Connors in said real estate, and there is now due and owing him thereon the sum of eight hundred and thirty-four and ninety one-hundredths dollars, with interest thereon," etc. And there was a similar finding as to the $271. Judgment was accordingly entered that the property be sold; that the interests of the defendants Margaret O'Neill and Mary A. Connors in the property were subject to the payment of the said sums of $834.90 and $271, which constituted liens thereon; and that the proceeds of the sale be applied to the payment and satisfaction of said liens. The said defendants moved for a new trial upon the ground that the court erred in allowing the claim of Kirkpatrick, as aforesaid, for the sum of $834.90, and declaring it a lien on their interests in the property described, and ordering the proceeds of the sale applied in satisfaction thereof, and their motion was denied. From the order thus made denying their motion they appeal.

1. In support of the appeal it is contended that the decree of distribution of the estate of Matthew Connors did not create any lien upon the property distributed, for the reason that a lien can only be created by contract or by operation of law. The language of the decree was that the property be distributed, "subject to the claim of said administrator for the sum of $834.90," etc. This was in effect declaring that the property was charged with the payment of the sum named, and, in our opinion, it created a lien on the property by operation of law. And that the court had the right and power to so charge the property was in effect decided by this court in the case of In re Moore, 96 Cal. 522, 31 Pac. 584.

2. It is further contended that when the property of the estate of Michael Connors was distributed to appellants they took it free and clear of all claims and liens declared against it in the distribution of the former estate, and subject to no other charge than such as was imposed by the last and final decree of distribution to them. In support of this position, sections 1666 and 1908 subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure are cited. This contention cannot be sustained. Section 1666 makes the decree conclusive only as to the rights of the heirs, legatees, or devisees. It does not in any way relate to or affect the rights of adverse claimants. In re Rowland, 74 Cal. 523, 16 Pac. 315. And the other section cited has no bearing upon the question in hand. It declares that a judgment or order in respect to the probate of a will, or the administration of the estate of a decedent, is conclusive as to the will or administration. But no such question arises here. It follows, in our opinion, that the order appealed from should be affirmed.

placed in his charge by a person other than the owner, without the owner's knowledge or authority.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action by Dawson Lowe and others against C. L. Woods and others. There was judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Adams appeals. Reversed.

F. Adams and F. A. Dorn, for appellant. Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action brought by livery and feed stable keepers to foreclose a lien upon a horse for the feeding of the animal. The horse was placed by defendant Woods in charge of plaintiffs, he agreeing to pay the sum of $20 per month for his care and feed. At this time Woods was in possession under a contract of purchase from the defendant Adams, the true owner, the agreement between them being that he should have the use of the horse, and should feed and care for him, but that the title should remain in Adams until the sum agreed upon was paid; and that event never came to pass. It was further expressly stipulated by these parties that Woods should keep the horse without cost or expense to Adams, and that, upon his failure to pay the amount stipulated, it should be redelivered without cost or expense. This appeal is prosecuted by defendant Adams from a judgment foreclosing the lien, and ordering a sale of the horse.

Among other matters, it is found by the trial court that Adams was at all the times mentioned in the complaint the owner of the horse; that Woods informed plaintiffs, at the time they received the horse, that Adams was the owner thereof, and within one week thereafter plaintiffs had full knowledge of the terms and conditions of the contract by virtue of which Woods had possession. It thus appears that the court not only found the ownership of the horse to be in appellant Adams, but found that respondents had knowledge of the fact upon the first day of their possession, and within a few days subsequent thereto had complete and perfect information of all the circumstances surrounding Woods' possession. There is certainly no principle of law that would entitle plaintiffs to a lien upon this horse after they became conversant with the character of Woods' possession, and all the terms of the agreement under which he held. We will not consider the effect of the finding of the court that plaintiffs were informed by Woods, when the horse was placed in their care, that Adams was the owner thereof, as we are prepared to take a broader view, and hold that in this case, as disclosed by its entire history, no lien whatever was created in favor of plaintiffs.

LOWE et al. v. WOODS et al. (No. 19,268.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 6, 1893.)

AGISTOR'S LIEN—WHEN ATTACHES.

Civil Code, § 3051, providing that livery stable keepers shall have a lien dependent on possession for feeding horses, gives no lien to a livery stable keeper for boarding a horse, lows: "And livery or boarding or feed-stable proprietors, and persons pasturing horses or stock have a lien dependent on possession for their compensation in caring for, boarding, feeding or pasturing such horses or stock." In Domnau v. Green, (Tex. App.) 19 S. W. 909, under a statute in all material respects similar to the provisions of our Code, and upon a state of facts involving the principle presented in this appeal, the supreme court of that state said: "This is not a question of notice, but a matter of property right, in which the doctrine of caveat emptor applies. In order for the statutory lien to attach, it is necessary that the animal be placed with the livery keeper by its owner, or some one having authority from him." In Stott v. Scott, 68 Tex. 304, 4 S. W. 494, the court said: "There is nothing in this statute to indicate an intention to give such a lien on property which may be placed in such a stable as is mentioned by some person, neither the owner nor the agent of the owner. It has been held that the lien given by the common law to an innkeeper upon the horse of a traveler who becomes his guest will attach, although the guest may have stolen the horse; but it is not believed that such a lien has ever been held to exist upon property placed with one who has a lien only by force of a statute, by a person not the owner or the agent of the owner." Under a quite similar statute the supreme court of New Hampshire, in Sargent v. Usher, 55 N. H. 287, said: "The idea that a lien may be created by a contract of the possessor of animals for their keeping, the owner being in no way privy to such contract, when no rights whatever as against the owner could be conferred or created by a contract of sale, seems anomalous, to say the least. Such a thing would, as it seems to me, be a violation of the fundamental rights of property guaranteed by the constitution, and, if the legislature had undertaken by this act to create a lien to arise on such a state of facts, I think it would be the duty of the court, as more than intimated by Foster, J., in Jacobs v. Knapp, 50 N. H. 82, to hold the act so far unconstitutional and void." And, in the same case, Cushing, C. J., said: "Now, there seems no good reason why a party not the owner should be permitted to pledge the property, or create a lien upon it, either at common law or by statute, any more than he should be permitted to sell it. Neither is there any good reason why a person who is about to establish relations with another out of which a lien would be created should not make the same inquiries which would be incumbent on him to make if he were going to purchase the property. * * * It is claimed in the plaintiff's brief that Robinson ought to be considered in law as agent of the defendant; but I have seen no case in which it has been held that a party who permits another to have possession of his personal property, by so doing, in law constitutes that other his agent to sell or pledge that property." In Small v. Robinson, 69 Me. 425, it was held that a hackman having the possession of a hack, upon terms similar to those upon which Woods was in possession of this horse, had no interest in the hack that would allow him to create a lien upon it for repairs; the court quoting the language of Shaw, C. J., in Hollingsworth v. Dow, 19 Pick. 228, wherein he said: "A lien is a proprietary interest, a qualified ownership, and in general can only be created by the owner, or by some person by him authorized." The principle of law here involved is also fully discussed in Robinson v. Baker, 5 Cush. 137; Jacobs v. Knapp, 50 N. H. 71; and Hollingsworth v. Dow, 19 Pick. 228.

At the time Woods placed the horse in the custody of plaintiffs, defendant Adams was the owner. The title was in her. The court so found under the agreement, and authority in law is not lacking to support the finding. Kohler v. Hayes, 41 Cal. 455; Hegler v. Eddy, 53 Cal. 598. Adams being the owner of the horse, without her assent Woods could not sell it; he could not pledge it; neither had he the power to create a lien upon it by placing it in the hands of an agistor. Without any contract upon appellant's part, without any personal liability whatever, without her assent in any form, and even without any notice to her of the facts which are claimed to have created the lien, it is now sought to take her property, and apply it to the satisfaction of Woods' debt. Such a practice would be violative of the fundamental principle of law that no man's property can be taken from him without his consent. Respondents' counsel rely upon Chuch v. Garrison, 75 Cal. 199, 16 Pac. 885, to support the judgment attacked by this appeal. The question was there presented upon a general demurrer to a complaint in intervention. The decision of the court is not as full and explicit as it might have been, but, as we construe it, it is there decided that actual ownership of the machine by the parties hiring the work done was not necessary to give plaintiffs a standing in court. In a limited sense this is true, and only in a limited sense. It was never intended to hold that a thief, by his contract with an agistor or mechanic, could create a lien upon the stolen property, or that a stranger in no way in privity with the true owner could create such a lien. Aside from the question of estoppel of the owner by reason of his negligence, (and we have no such question presented in this case,) the lien can only be created by the owner, or by some one duly authorized to act for him. English authorities, and some early American cases, have recognized a different rule as to common carriers and innkeepers; but as to common carriers the law declared in those cases was held unsound in Robinson v. Baker, supra, and we have no doubt that as to innkeepers the true rule forms no exception to the general principle we have declared. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment be reversed and the cause remanded.

SCHMITT v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 14,419.)

DEDICATION—OFFER OF—REVOCATION.

1. The drawing of side lines through a block in a plat of land, indicating that it may be intended for a street, but not designating it by name as such, is merely an offer to dedicate; and where the land so designated is not a continuation of any existing street, and has not been accepted or used by the public, and no one has acted on the offer by purchasing lots on the faith of the delineation of the land as a street, the owner may revoke the offer.

2. A deed of the entire block by the owner, describing it by metes and bounds, without reference to the alleged street delineated on the plat, and conveying it as part of the land sold, operates as a revocation of the offer to dedicate.

3. The fact that after such revocation the city attempted to accept the offer of dedication by delineating the street on the official city maps is immaterial, since, after the revocation of the offer, the land became private property.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Francisco county; J. P. Hoge, Judge.

Action by George Schmitt against the city and county of San Francisco to quiet title to land alleged by defendant to be a street.

From a judgment in defendant's favor, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

F. J. Castelhun, for appellant. John H. Durst, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an action to quiet title to portion of block 223, Western addition to San Francisco. The defendant claims that it has been dedicated to the public use as a street. Whether it has or not is the only question involved. The defendant had judgment, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from the refusal of a new trial. It appears from the findings that in 1855 one Thomas Hayes owned a large tract of land within the city of San Francisco, called the "Hayes Tract," that in June, 1859, he caused the whole tract to be surveyed and subdivided into blocks and lots, extending through it the streets already existing in the city. A map was made by Hayes showing these streets, blocks, and lots, and indorsed, "Map of the Hayes tract, lots and blocks, according to the official survey by M. Hoadley." Upon this map, Hayes indorsed his certificate, which contained the following: "I, Thomas Hayes, proprietor of the land as herein subdivided within the dotted lines indicated by magnetic courses in red ink, hereby declare this map, for all time to come to be unalterable, and have this day filed the same in the recorder's office of the city and county of San Francisco for description and legal reference," etc. The certificate was dated June 10, 1859, and the map was filed on that day, and has ever since remained on file. A section of this map was put in evidence, showing the tract in controversy, and a part of the north and west lines of the Hayes tract. The following is a copy:

EXHIBIT "D"

The tract in controversy here appears as a cul-de-sac. It is contended that it forms a part of Elm street. Elm street does not appear on any official map, so far as the evidence shows, prior to 1866. Hayes tract did not touch the supposed street at any other point. The Van Ness map includes block 226, and according to it there is no street dividing block 226. I find no evidence in the record that such street has been in fact opened and used at any point. The official map of 1866, however, shows such a street, and represents it as extending through block 226. Hayes caused to be printed upon his map a notice that the property delineated would be sold at public auction at a stated time and place, and accordingly the greater part of the tract was sold and Hayes deeded to the purchasers the lots according to the map. April 26, 1862, the legislature passed an act entitled "An act to establish the lines and grades of the streets in the city and county of San Francisco," whereby a board was constituted to survey all the streets, and fix the lines thereof, and to make maps showing the width of all streets. Under this act, surveys were made which were completed, and maps made by another board created by an act passed in 1864. The maps and surveys having been made and filed, the board of supervisors gave notice for three weeks, as required by statute, that the maps and surveys were filed, and open for public inspection. Under the act any property holder dissatisfied was authorized to file objections, which should be considered by the board of engineers, and afterwards the map, as finally passed by that board, should be reported to the board of supervisors, who were then empowered to approve the same, and, if approved, the map was to stand as the legal and official map of the city, and determine the lines and grades of the streets. It is found that all of these requirements were complied with, and the map was duly approved January 30, 1866, and became and is the official map. The tax rolls and block books from the office of the assessor and tax collector were introduced in evidence for the fiscal year 1863-64 and succeeding years. The block books show the premises in controversy as a part of Elm street. The descriptions in the assessments and tax receipts, however, do not show, except by reference to the assessor's maps, that any part of block 226 was exempted from assessment and taxation. The court found from this evidence that the property had been exempt from taxation as a street since 1862. June 7, 1862, Hayes sold and conveyed to L. L. Hawley all of block 226, which was within his tract, describing it as follows: "Commencing at the northwest corner of Tyler and Laguna streets; running thence westerly, along the north line of Tyler street, to the northwestern boundary line of the Hayes tract; thence northeasterly, along said boundary line, to the south line of Turk street; thence easterly, along the said line, to the west line of Laguna street; thence, at right angles, southerly, and along the last said line, two hundred and seventy-five feet, to the point of commencement, being a portion of block No. 226, Western addition, and a part of the Hayes tract." This was the only sale or conveyance ever made by Hayes of any land in block 226. This part of Elm avenue or street has never been used as a street. At the time of the conveyance, a high ridge of sand covered the land in dispute, and extended across Laguna street, and into Jefferson square. There does not appear to have been any improvement in the block, except a vegetable garden on Tyler street. Hawley graded the portion purchased by her, including the land in controversy, as also Laguna street, and immediately inclosed her land, building a bulkhead along Laguna street the whole distance, which still remains.

Do these facts show a dedication of the land to the public as a street, which was irrevocable? And, if not, did the deed to Hawley operate as a revocation? It will not be disputed that the survey and map, accompanied by the solemn declaration of the owner, followed by sales and conveyances of a large portion of the property described by reference to the map, constituted, as to the owner, a complete dedication of the property designated on the map as streets. The property in question, although side lines were drawn which might indicate that it was intended to be a street, was not by name designated as such, and was not the continuation of any street. Since a street was subsequently laid out there, extending through the entire block, as well as other blocks, it is probable that such a street had been proposed. As to this property, the marks upon the map may be supposed to indicate a willingness on the part of Hayes to allow a street to be established there. Treating it as an offer, could he then withdraw it? In Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 43, 28 Pac. 839, it is said: "When the owner of property which is within the limits of an incorporated city or town makes and records a map of such property, by which he subdivides the same into blocks and lots bounded by streets which are continuations of other streets already laid out by the city or town, and sells and conveys the lots abutting upon those streets, he thereby dedicates to the public the streets so laid out by him as prolongations of other streets, as well as the other streets which are laid out upon such map, intersecting and connecting the same; * * * The property dedicated has become public property, impressed with the use for which it was dedicated, and neither can the public divert it from that use, nor can it be lost by adverse possession. Nor is the effect of such dedication impaired by any delay in the use of the land for which it was set apart. * * * Whether the owner by making sales according to such map or designation, has made the offer with reference to other streets than those by which the lots sold are bounded, is a fact that the court must determine from the circumstances of each case; * * * The owner, after selling some of the lots according to such map, might, either with the consent of the purchasers, or if he should himself repurchase all of the lots so sold, withdraw such offer at any time before the public had acquired any interest in the streets, either from formal acceptance or by actual user." In other words, if the dedication has not been accepted or the property used by the public, it is purely a question of estoppel in pais. If no one has acted upon the offer in such a mode that they would be injured by the revocation, the owner may revoke the dedication, even though it be an actual dedication, and not a mere offer. This doctrine has been frequently announced by the courts, and, so far as I can discover, has never been questioned. In Cincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. 431, it is said: "After being set apart for public use, and enjoyed as such, and private and individual rights acquired with reference to it, the law considers it in the nature of an estoppel in pais, which precludes the original owner from revoking such dedication." See 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. p. 744, note 1, where numerous authorities are cited to the same effect; also, Elliott, Roads & S. 91, 92, and note.

Applying that principle to the case under consideration, I see no reason why a revocation might not have been made as to this property at the time Hayes conveyed to Hawley. It may be conceded that the purchasers from Hayes had a right to insist upon the entire scheme under which they were induced to purchase, so far as any benefit could possibly accrue to them therefrom, but they could have no interest in having a cul-de-sac established in a block which was then entirely unimproved. Until a business was established there, or improvements which they might be interested in having maintained, it must have been an immaterial matter to those who owned no property in the block. Bridges v. Wyckoff, 67 N. Y. 130. If, at the time Hayes conveyed to Hawley, he had a right to revoke the dedication or offer to dedicate the land in controversy, there can be no doubt that conveyance had that effect. The description made no reference to the alleged street, but conveyed it as part of the tract sold. If the map and other facts show an offer to dedicate only, a conveyance without reservation must amount to a revocation, unless the purchaser had notice of some fact which would estop the grantor from revoking. It is a proposal to donate, and, if the proposed donor transfers the property before it has passed to the donee to another, it is no longer his to give. The block map was entirely immaterial, in any view. It could not conclude the property owner. San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72

Cal. 170, 13 Pac. 405. At the time those books were made, there was no pending offer to dedicate, and, if there had been, the assessor had no authority to accept for the public.

Nor do I think the engineer's map of 1866 can conclude the plaintiff. The land, at the time that map was made, had become private property. It was affirmatively shown that no street or way existed at this point when the Van Ness ordinance was passed, and it was not so marked on the Van Ness map. Under such circumstances, I can discover no respect in which the case differs in principle from Whelan v. Boyd, 93 Cal. 500, 29 Pac. 69. The opinion in that case, it is true, states that the land in that case was held under an alcalde grant, but that fact does not distinguish that case from this. In either case the title is from the same source, the Pueblo or its successor, the city; and I do not understand that the city has reserved any right with reference to lands acquired under the Van Ness ordinance which would justify the appropriation of them without compensation, beyond those selected by the commission thereby provided for. The land in controversy was not so selected. To this it may be added that it does not appear from what source Hayes derived his title. The proposition, of course, is that the land was designated as a street on the engineer's map, and that notice was given requiring property owners to come in and make objections, if any they had, to the proposed map as showing the streets and other public grounds claimed by the city, and the provision that the board of engineers should consider such objections, and might alter the map if so disposed, and that the map, as finally approved, should be the official map, and constitute evidence of streets, etc. Even had there been no authority upon the subject, I think this map alone could not be held conclusive upon this subject. There has been, however, very little discussion of that matter in the briefs, and, as it has been decided, it is not worth while to consider the matter further. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHEE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

CORCORAN v. HINKEL et al. (No. 15,325.)

MORTGAGES — WAIVER OF REDEMPTION RIGHTS — FORFEITURE TO SATISFY LIEN — ACTION TO RE-DEEM — FINDINGS — EVIDENCE.

1. Defendant in a mortgage foreclosure suit made a compromise agreement with plaintiff, whereby the latter agreed to accept a part of the amount claimed if paid within 16 months, the purpose of the parties being stated to be a sale of the mortgaged premises after a reasonable time to extinguish the debt as fixed by the contract, and to save expenses of foreclosure sale. The contract provided that the land be conveyed to trustees, and be by them reconveyed in case defendant paid plaintiff within 12 months; that defendant might sell any part by having the price paid to plaintiff; that after 12 and before 16 months plaintiff might sell the remainder at auction; that a decree should be entered for the full amount claimed, and proceedings stayed until the expiration of the 16 months, at the end of which time the trustees should convey the unsold land to plaintiff, who might sell it under the decree, in which case the agreement fixing the amount due should be void. Defendant conveyed the land to the trustees, and then negotiated a sale to H., but defects in the title delayed the closing of the sale until after the 16 months during which the trustees had power to convey to a purchaser, and it was necessary to convey to plaintiff in order to give H. a good title. Plaintiff, with defendant's consent, conveyed the land to H. at the agreed price. Held, that Civil Code, § 2889, which provides that "all contracts for the forfeiture of property subject to lien, in satisfaction of a lien secured thereby, and all contracts in restraint of the right of redemption from a lien, are void," had no application to such transaction.

2. The fact that plaintiff did not formally cancel the indebtedness against such defendant did not entitle the latter's administratrix to redeem the land from the sale to H. when it appeared that such plaintiff never asserted the existence of any such indebtedness after the conveyance of the land to it by the trustees, and that it actually received such conveyance in full satisfaction.

3. It appeared that defendant authorized the trustees to sell the land at a price named, and "to pay commissions" out of the proceeds. They then authorized certain brokers to sell, and the latter negotiated a sale at the price named by defendant. On the title being found defective, defendant directed the trustees to decrease the price agreed on through such brokers by the amount necessary to perfect the title, which they did. Held, that the brokers were the agents, not of the trustees, but of defendant.

4. A finding that the mortgagee granted, bargained, and sold the land to H. is not inconsistent with the finding of the circumstances attending the sale, which show that the conveyance was made in fulfillment of the arrangement between deceased, (the mortgagor,) and H., by which the mortgagee became the conduit through which the title passed.

5. In such case H.'s title is unaffected by any knowledge or want of knowledge by him of the contents of the deed from the trustees to his grantor, the mortgagee, or of the trust agreement.

6. In such action to redeem it was competent for H. to show by parol that the conveyance by the trustees to the mortgagee was made, not as a forfeiture, but to consummate a sale made by the mortgagor to a third party.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Mary F. Corcoran, as administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of William Corcoran, deceased, against John Hinkel and others, to redeem certain land which deceased had mortgaged to defendant German Savings & Loan Society, and which was afterwards conveyed by it to defendant Hinkel. There was a judgment for defendants, and an appeal by plaintiff from such judgment was dismissed. From an order denying her motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John A. McKenna, for appellant. Robert H. Countryman and T. V. O'Brien, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Mary F. Corcoran, as administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of William Corcoran, deceased, brought suit against John Hinkel and a large number of other defendants, among whom were the German Savings & Loan Society, William M. Pierson, John R. Jarboe, and S. H. Regensberger, the principal object of which was to be permitted to redeem certain premises therein described which Corcoran had mortgaged to said German Savings & Loan Society on July 9, 1877, to secure the sum of $95,000, then loaned to him by the mortgagee, and which was afterwards conveyed by the German Savings & Loan Society (whom for convenience we will hereafter designate as the "Bank") to defendant Hinkel. The other defendants not above named were purchasers, respectively, of portions of the property from defendant Hinkel.

The complaint, after alleging the making of the mortgage above mentioned, alleged in substance that in July, 1883, the bank commenced an action to foreclose said mortgage, claiming that there was then due thereunder about $100,000. Corcoran answered, claiming that by reason of a sale at much less than its value of part of block 144, which he had conveyed to the president of the bank as further security, the amount due was very much less than that demanded; that on March 31, 1886, no decree having been taken in the foreclosure suit, a compromise agreement was made and executed, whereby Corcoran admitted there was then due under said mortgage the sum of $60,000, and the bank agreed to make a further loan or advancement to Corcoran of the sum of $5,000, and would accept in full of all its claims against him the sum of $65,000, with interest from that date at 6 per cent., together with the amount of taxes, street assessments, etc., which it might be required to pay, provided the amounts thus agreed upon should be paid within 16 months from the date of the agreement. This agreement, which is set out in full in the complaint, recites the pendency of said foreclosure suits, and the contention as to the amount due, and declares that it is the intention of the parties to adjust, compromise, and settle such differences and disputes, and to finally fix and determine the rights, obligations, and duties of the parties; and that "it is the desire and intention of all the parties hereto that the land and premises involved and described in said action be sold, after the lapse of a reasonable time for the purpose of extinguishing all the obligations of the said William Corcoran to said corporation, as the same are determined and fixed by this agreement, and to save, if possible, the expenditure of sheriff's fees upon a foreclosure sale, and to obtain as high a price as possible for the benefit of all concerned herein." The agreement further provided that the mortgaged property, being a large number of parcels situate in Mission block No. 21 of the city of San Francisco, should be conveyed by Corcoran to John R. Jarboe and William M. Pierson by a deed of grant, bargain, and sale, to be held by them in trust for the uses and purposes specified in the agreement; that at any time within 12 months Corcoran should have the right to have conveyed to him all said property by the trustees upon payment to the bank of the sums above agreed upon, with taxes, etc., and interest, and upon such payment to release all liens and claims against him; that within said 12 months Corcoran might sell any portion of the premises with the consent of the bank, upon payment of the whole of the price received therefor; that after the expiration of 12 months and before the expiration of 16 months the bank should sell the unsold portions at public auction for cash, or upon terms of credit therein stated, and any surplus that should remain should be paid to Pierson, to whom Corcoran had sold portions of the mortgaged property prior to the agreement. The agreement further provided that to secure the performance of the agreement, and to enforce a sale, in case the property could not be sold under the terms of the agreement, a decree of foreclosure should be entered in the action then pending for the full amount claimed in the complaint, but all proceeding should be stayed until the expiration of the 16 months from the date of the agreement. Time was made the essence of the agreement, and, in case the compromise sum was not paid within the 16 months, the trustees should convey all of said property, or the unsold portions of it, to the bank, who might thereafter sell under its decree, and bid it in for the face of the decree and costs; and in such case the agreement fixing the indebtedness of Corcoran to the bank at $65,000 should be void. It was also further provided that purchasers of the property, whether made by auction, sheriff's, or other sale, should hold the same free and discharged from any claims of Corcoran, Pierson, or Jarboe, by all of whom and the bank the agreement was executed.

In pursuance of the stipulation, a decree was entered in the foreclosure case April 2, 1886, for the amount claimed in the complaint. Pierson, who had purchased some of the property subject to the mortgage, conveyed to Regensberger, and Regensberger joined with Corcoran in the conveyance to the trustees, and this deed was recorded August 20, 1887, and the said agreement was recorded February 7, 1888. On August 18, 1887, the trustees conveyed to the bank in pursuance of the agreement. The amount then due under the decree was $113,779.07. Said deed contained the following clause: "And the said William Corcoran and the said S. H. Regensberger have joined in this instrument in token of their acknowledgment that the matters herein recited are true;" and they signed said deed. This deed, it is alleged, was recorded August 19, 1887, and on the next day the bank conveyed to defendant Hinkel all of said property for the consideration of $80,000, and Hinkel gave the bank a mortgage on the same property for $50,000, part of the purchase price. The complaint further alleges that Hinkel took this conveyance with full knowledge of said agreement and of the Corcoran mortgage and of the foreclosure proceedings, and that the properties so conveyed to him "were for a long time prior to the commencement of this suit, and now are, worth the sum of $200,000 or thereabouts." The complaint was not verified.

All the defendants answered. The answer of the bank and Mr. Jarboe was: (1) A general denial. (2) A judgment of dismissal of a former suit brought by the plaintiff upon the same cause of action, numbered 22,804, in superior court. (3) A judgment of nonsuit in another action, numbered 27,690, in superior court. (4) Alleged the original mortgage, foreclosure proceedings, disputes as to amount of Corcoran liability, the making of the agreement, and the conveyance to the trustees, the efforts of Corcoran to sell; that it was placed in the hands of Bovee, Toy & Co., as his agents; and they negotiated a sale to Hinkel for said sum of $30,000; that there were defects in the title which caused delays in the transaction, which carried it beyond said period of 16 months; that the power of the trustees to convey to a purchaser under the terms of the agreement had ceased, and for that reason it became necessary to convey to the bank under the terms of the trust in order to give the purchaser a good title; that such conveyance was made for the purpose of consummating the sale thus negotiated to Hinkel, and was made with the knowledge, concurrence, and consent of Corcoran, and at his instance and request; and by the conveyance to the bank and from the bank to Hinkel the sale made by the agents, Bovee, Toy & Co., was consummated, and that Corcoran never afterwards asserted or claimed that he had any interest in the property. The court found in favor of defendants, and rendered judgment against the plaintiff. An appeal was taken from the judgment, which was dismissed, and this appeal is from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

Appellant contends that the agreement of March 31, 1886, and the trust deed to Jarboe and Pierson, were intended to and did operate as a security to the bank, for the sum fixed thereby to be due to the bank under the mortgage, and the further sum of $5,000 then loaned by the bank to Corcoran; that the clause therein providing for a forfeiture in case the same should not be paid within 16 months was void, and that the conveyance by the trustees to the bank did not convey an absolute title, nor cut off Corcoran's right to redeem. In support of this contention counsel for appellant cites section 2889 of the Civil Code, which is as follows: "All contracts for the forfeiture of property subject to a lien, in satisfaction of a lien secured thereby, and all contracts in restraint of the right of redemption from a lien are void;" and many authorities are also cited by counsel in support of that proposition. The court found all the facts stated in the fourth defense of the answer of the bank and Jarboe and Pierson to be true, (except as to the cancellation upon the books of Corcoran's debt;) and these facts take the case out of the spirit and purpose of the above code provision. The code commissioners, in a note to this section, say: "Of course a mortgagor may sell his property to a mortgagee, but the transaction must be a genuine sale and not a forfeiture." If we examine this contract, it will be found that its evident purpose was to afford Corcoran an opportunity to dispose of the property, and pay the compromise sum, within the time limited thereby. The title was vested in the trustees as clearly for that purpose as for the other purpose of conveying to the bank in case no sale should be made within the time limited; and the sale of the property was in fact made by Corcoran to the defendant Hinkel, though it was consummated by a conveyance through the bank, because of delays in perfecting the title after the terms of sale were agreed upon, which carried the transaction beyond the time limited in the agreement within which the trustees were authorized to convey to a purchaser, and which made it necessary that the title should pass through the bank. The testimony of the witnesses in this regard is conclusively corroborated by the conduct of the bank, for, under the terms of the agreement and of the trust deed, as well as of the deed from the trustees to the bank, it was no longer obliged to accept the compromise sum of $65,000, but had a right to the sum found in the decree of foreclosure amounting to $113,000, and to buy the property at that sum; but, instead of doing so, the bank carried out the sale as agreed upon between Corcoran and Hinkel, and conveyed the property to him the next day after the trustees conveyed to it, receiving $30,000 cash, and taking a mortgage from Hinkel for $50,000.

It is said, however, that the bank did not cancel Corcoran's indebtedness. The court found "that no formal cancellation was proved," but that it was proved that the bank had never claimed or asserted that any indebtedness existed from Corcoran after the conveyance made to it by the trustees, and that the bank actually did receive said conveyance in full satisfaction. But it is further contended by appellant that the alleged sale by Corcoran to Hinkel was not made by Corcoran; that the trustees employed Bovee, Toy & Co., real-estate brokers, to sell the property, and that they had no authority to do so. The court, however, found that Bovee, Toy & Co. were employed by Corcoran, as alleged in the fourth defense. This finding is based upon a written authority given by Corcoran to Jarboe and Pierson to sell the property for $85,000, and to pay commissions out of the proceeds. In their efforts to sell, therefore, they were not acting under any power contained in the trust deed, but under a direct authority from Corcoran. Jarboe and Pierson, after they received this authority from Corcoran, authorized Bovee, Toy & Co. to sell. They negotiated a sale to Hinkel at the price of $85,000, conditioned upon the title being found satisfactory. Upon investigation it was found that it would require $5,000 to clear the title by buying Pattee's claim, and upon this being reported to Corcoran, on July 9, 1887, he wrote Jarboe and Pierson: "You are authorized to so modify the contract of March 23, 1887, made by you through Bovee, Toy & Co. with John Hinkel for the sale of the property therein described, as to make the purchase price $80,000, instead of $85,000, it being understood, however, that the purchaser is to take the title subject to the Pattee title and suits and the Donahue title." The authority given Jarboe and Pierson contemplated the employment of subagents, while the above writing ratified such employment, and made Bovee, Toy & Co. his agents. The finding that the conveyance was made to the bank with the agreement that the bank should convey to Hinkel in compliance with the agreement made through Bovee, Toy & Co., and with the consent and concurrence of Corcoran, is sustained by the evidence; and, in view of the foregoing the further contention of appellant that $80,000 was not an adequate consideration for the property is without merit.

It is further insisted by appellant that certain of the findings are conflicting. The conflict alleged is between finding No. 45 and findings numbered 20 to 25, inclusive. In finding 20 it is said the bank granted, bargained, and sold the property to Hinkel. This is not inconsistent with the finding of the circumstances attending it which show the conveyance to have been made in fulfillment of the arrangement between Corcoran and Hinkel which made the bank the conduit through which the title passed. Finding 21 is to the effect that Hinkel had only constructive knowledge of the contents of the deed from the trustees to the bank. But it is immaterial, so far as the validity of his title is concerned, whether he had actual or constructive knowledge. Finding 22 relates to Hinkel's knowledge of the trust agreement, and to which the above is a sufficient reply. His title is unaffected by any knowledge or want of knowledge of that agreement. Finding 23 is that Hinkel purchased in good faith. We find nothing in the findings which conflicts with that statement. As to findings 24 and 25, it is immaterial whether Hinkel relied as to title upon the fact that the bank had taken a mortgage upon the property, or whether he had only constructive knowledge of the decree of foreclosure, nor can we perceive any conflict in the findings which in any manner affects the judgment.

Appellant further insists upon a reversal because the court failed to pass upon certain objections to evidence during the trial. Defendants had put in evidence the written authority given by Corcoran to Jarboe and Pierson, dated July 29, 1887, to accept $80,000 from Hinkel because of some defect in the title; and Mr. Pierson, being examined as a witness on the part of defendants, was asked, "When was that sale consummated?" The witness replied: "It was consummated through the German Bank. I don't know the date of the transaction." Counsel for plaintiff said, "We object to that, unless there is some authority here." The court said, "Well, he has not offered it yet." The witness, continuing, testified that after the negotiations had culminated in an agreement as to price, the question of passing the title came up. An objection was made that the power of the trustees had expired by limitation, and that the proper course would be for the trustees to convey to the bank, and have the bank complete the transaction. Plaintiff's counsel contended that, unless this was followed up by written authority, the testimony was irrelevant and incompetent. After discussion the court said, "I see no objection to the proof at all." The record then states that the witness was allowed to go on with the understanding that defendants supplement the parol proof with written evidence that Corcoran authorized it, and that plaintiff had the right to renew these objections at any time during the trial. Other parts of the record show that it was not claimed that Corcoran in writing assented to this mode of transfer, unless such assent could be inferred from the fact that he joined in the deed to the bank in token that the recitals therein contained were true, while nothing is found intimating that defendants intended to supplement this evidence by written evidence; nor does the record show that the objections were renewed. In appellant's brief it is said the point was argued in the court below in the briefs filed, but that is not in the record. The objection raised by counsel was clearly ruled upon by the court, when it said, "I see no objection to the proof at all;" and no exception was taken. Besides, the evidence was clearly competent, and the plaintiff would not have been benefited by an exception. Without citing authorities, it may be briefly said that in this state it is well settled that a deed absolute upon its face may be shown by parol evidence to be a mortgage, and, that being true, no reason can be conjectured why such evidence may not be rebutted by parol. It was clearly competent to show by parol that the conveyance was made to the bank, not as a forfeiture to it, but to consummate a sale made by Corcoran to a third party. We find no ground for a reversal. The order appealed from is affirmed.

SNYDER v. CLARK. (No. 15,173.)

ACTION ON CONTRACT—EVIDENCE—ESTOPPEL.

In an action against an administrator on a contract for the payment of money, it appeared that one W. had a judgment against such decedent and plaintiff's father, as sureties for another, and a separate judgment against plaintiff as surety for the same person. Two days before the sale of the principal debtor's land on executions, plaintiff agreed to pay the judgment against her father and decedent, and the latter agreed to repay her one-half such sum. At the sale, plaintiff bid in the land for the amount of both judgments, and gave to W. her notes for the amount, which she afterwards paid. The sheriff returned the executions satisfied by such sale. Held, that she was not estopped from showing that the land was heavily incumbered, and worth much less than the amount bid by her at the sale.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. F. Crawford, Judge.

Action by Rachel J. Snyder against Fred. L. Clark, administrator of the estate of O. W. Craig, deceased, on a contract between plaintiff and defendant's intestate for the payment of money. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Lippitt & Lippitt, for appellant. Wm. E. McConnell, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The defendant is administrator of O. W. Craig, deceased. Craig, in his lifetime, and Franklin Sears, as sureties, had, with G. C. P. Sears as principal, made two promissory notes to one Wickersham for something over $4,000, and on December 9, 1889, Wickersham had recovered judgment on said notes against all three of said persons for $4,280.40 and costs. The plaintiff herein and said Franklin Sears had also, as sureties, made another note, with said G. C. P. Sears as principal, to said Wickersham for a large amount, upon which Wickersham at the same time had recovered a judgment for $21,582.60 and costs. Wickersham took out executions on said judgments, upon which personal property of G. C. P. Sears was levied upon, and sold for something over $16,000. This money was applied pro rata upon the two judgments, leaving unsatisfied upon the judgment against Craig and the two Searses, the sum of $2,010, and upon the judgment against the plaintiff, Mrs. Snyder, and the two Searses, $10,053. There is no issue in the case as to the propriety and legality of said pro rata application to said judgments.

The said Franklin Sears was the father of the plaintiff, Mrs. Snyder, and it is averred in the complaint (substantially) that she proposed to Craig that she would pay her father's half of said balance of $2,010, for which she was not liable, if he, Craig, would pay the other half; that Craig assented to the proposition, but said that he would not have any ready money for a short time, and agreed and promised that, if she would also pay his half and satisfy the judgment, he would pay to her his half, to wit, $1,005; that in pursuance of his agreement and promise she paid the whole of said amount, and thereby satisfied said judgment; that afterwards Craig refused to pay her any part of said $1,005, and that his administrator, after due presentation of her claim, also refuses to pay any part thereof. The action is to recover said $1,005. The court below found that such contract had been made by and between said Craig and plaintiff, but found, also, that plaintiff had not paid and satisfied said balance of judgment of $2,010, and thereupon gave judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

The only question involved is whether or not appellant paid and satisfied said judgment. At the time of the levy of the execution upon the personal property of said G. C. P. Sears there was also a levy made upon certain real property belonging to him, and this real property was sold by the sheriff on June 30, 1890, which was after the said contract between Craig and plaintiff. Plaintiff purchased this real property at said sale, and bid for it the whole amount of both of said judgments. The sheriff returned the executions as wholly satisfied, and got from the attorney of Wickersham a receipt for the money bid by plaintiff. Plaintiff gave to Wickersham her note for the full amount of her bid and of the two judgments, which note she afterwards paid in full. Under these circumstances the court found that appellant had not satisfied said judgment against Craig and Sears, but that it was satisfied out of the proceeds of said sale of the real property of G. C. P. Sears to appellant under said executions. It is strenuously argued by appellant that the finding that she did not satisfy said judgment in accordance with her contract with Craig is against the evidence, and also that the court erred in excluding certain evidence offered by appellant on that point. From certain rulings made at the trial, and from a certain question asked by the court of one of the witnesses, we are disposed to think that the court attached too much conclusiveness to record facts about the sale of the real property, to wit, that appellant bid at such sale a certain sum of money, that she received a certificate of purchase, that the sheriff got a receipt from Wickersham's attorney for the amount of money bid, and that the executions were returned wholly satisfied. These facts seem to have been treated, to some extent, as an estoppel against appellant. For instance, the court finds that "the moneys derived from said sale were applied by said sheriff in payment of the judgments," and that "the said moneys so realized by said sheriff from the sales of said property of said G. C. P. Sears was paid by said sheriff to I. G. Wickersham, the judgment creditor." But these findings must have been based largely upon the legal view that the return of the sheriff was conclusive, for the evidence shows, beyond question, that as a fact the sheriff never paid any money arising out of the sale of the real property to Wickersham, and never received any money on that transaction except his costs. Lippitt, who was attorney for Wickersham, and whose testimony is uncontradicted, after explaining the transaction fully, testified that "she bought it from the sheriff, and the note was given for the balance of the judgments, and I received of Mrs. Snyder the money which satisfied the judgments. The sheriff never had any money, but the satisfaction of the judgment was through the sheriff." If the real property to be sold was of little or no value, and the contract between appellant and Craig contemplated her right to bid at the sale, if she chose so to do, with a faint hope of getting something out of the property, it is clear that her purchase at such sale was no breach of her contract with Craig; and it is equally clear that going through the mere forms of having the sheriff return that he received the money as the price bid for the land, paid it over to the judgment creditor, etc., did not estop appellant, as against Craig, from showing the real facts. And the evidence tends strongly to the point that the contract was made in contemplation of appellant's right to bid at the sale. The contract was made on Saturday, June 28, 1890, and the sale of the real property was to take place on the 30th,—the next Monday. Mr. Enos, who witnessed the making of the contract, and whose testimony is uncontradicted, testified as follows: "Mrs. Snyder said to Mr. Craig: 'The sale of the real estate is to take place on Monday, and I want to know whether I will pay my father's share of the judgment of $2,010, or not. I will pay my father's share of that judgment if you will pay your share. I have got a ten thousand dollars and a little over judgment against me that I am responsible for, and I will not bid the real estate off unless you agree to pay your half of the judgment.' Mr. Craig told Mrs. Snyder that if she would pay her father's share of that judgment against him, that he would pay her $1,005, his share of the $2,010; that he expected George Maxwell to pay him, on the first of August, $2,000; then he would pay her the money. Mrs. Snyder said: 'Mr. Craig, I will pay the whole of the judgment if you will pay your half according to this arrangement.' He said he would." He further testified that Mrs. Snyder gave her note to Wickersham for the amount of the two judgments, and that he (the witness) afterwards paid and took up the note with her check. Lippitt also testified that he acted for Mrs. Snyder at the sale; that he was first instructed by her to bid the amount of the judgment upon which she was liable,—something over $10,000,—and was afterwards instructed by her to bid the amount of both judgments, "as she had an agreement with Mr. Craig." This witness also testified that the purchase turned out to be worthless. We are not able to see where this testimony was materially weakened, although the cross-examination developed a little confusion, and the evidence was perhaps not quite as full as it might have been. We will not, therefore, determine whether or not the finding was against the evidence that was actually introduced, because we think that the court erred to the prejudice of appellant in excluding certain evidence which she offered.

Appellant offered to prove that the land bid in by her at said sheriff's sale was mortgaged to the extent of $6,000, and that there had been a homestead declaration upon it made by G. C. P. Sears before the levy of the executions. The court sustained a general objection to this evidence, and appellant excepted. We think that this ruling was erroneous and material. The appellant clearly had the right to show the condition and value of the land, as a circumstance in the light of which her said contract with Craig was made, and as tending to show that the contract was as she claimed it to be. It is not to be supposed that Craig would have made such a contract if the land which he knew would be sold in a day or two, under the executions could probably be sold to a bona fide bidder for the amount of both judgments; but if the land was so incumbered as to be of no value, or of but a slight speculative value, he might well get rid of a judgment for the whole of which he was liable, by agreeing to pay one-half of it, regardless of the fact that appellant might, if she chose, bid off the land at the sheriff's sale, and take the chance of making something out of it in the future. The condition and value of the property bid off by appellant, the circumstances under which the bid was made, and the agreement with Craig entered into, and whatever tended to show whether or not the purchase of the land by appellant was a breach of said contract, should be admitted in evidence. We think that the court properly admitted in evidence the executions and the returns of the sheriff thereon. But they were not conclusive against appellant in this action. She had the right to show the real facts as to the satisfaction of the judgment, although the returns of the sheriff showed the form by which such satisfaction was expressed. Judgment and order reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PEOPLE v. WELLS. (No. 21,027.)

CRIMINAL LAW — MISCONDUCT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY—ASKING IMPROPER QUESTIONS.

Where, on a prosecution for forgery, the chief evidence against defendant was the testimony of H., the principal in the crime, and in his own behalf his own testimony, a conviction will be reversed where the prosecuting attorney asked defendant if he had not at another time forged his father-in-law's name, and also asked the captain of police (telling him not to answer until defendant had an opportunity to object) if one S. had not come to him and reported about defendant wanting him to tell H. to skip, though the questions are stricken out, since the asking of them was prejudicial and inexcusable, and made evidently for the purpose of taking an unfair advantage of defendant.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Clara Foltz, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The information charges the defendant, Wells, jointly with Ollie Hutchings, alias Grace Gilbert, with the crime of forgery. Wells was tried separately, was convicted, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

Appellant contends for a new trial upon several grounds: Because the assistant district attorney, representing the people, in his opening address to the jury made misstatements of facts prejudicial to appellant; because the court, while excluding all other witnesses not under examination, refused to so exclude a policeman who was a witness for and an active participant in the prosecution; because the court refused to strike out certain answers of the witness Leavitt; because one or two of the jurors were guilty of misconduct; because there is newly-discovered evidence material to appellant; and because appellant was prevented from having a fair and impartial trial by reason of the misconduct of the prosecuting attorney in asking a certain question of the witness Lees, and certain questions of the appellant when on the stand as a witness on his own behalf. The last ground of contention is the only one which we deem it necessary to largely discuss. It appeared from the evidence that Ollie Hutchings falsely personated Miss Emma L. Dick, the owner of certain real property in San Francisco; forged the name of Miss Dick to a note and mortgage on said property; acknowledged the mortgage as Miss Dick, before a notary; procured a loan of $8,000 on the mortgage, and in a day or two afterwards disappeared. The appellant, Wells, was a general business agent dealing in real and personal property, etc., and the said loan to Ollie Hutchings was effected in part by his agency. The prosecution charged that appellant was an accomplice of said Ollie in said false personation and forgery, while appellant claimed that, like the notary and others, he was deceived by her, and believed her to be Miss Dick. It appeared that after the forgery had been discovered appellant made considerable effort to discover the said Ollie, and for that purpose employed one Leavitt and one Staniels, who traveled through a number of the counties and cities of the state to find her. Staniels was put on the stand as a witness for the prosecution. Afterwards, while the captain of the police was being examined as a witness for the people, the prosecuting attorney asked him this question: "I want to ask one leading question, and do not answer it until counsel has an opportunity to object. Is it a fact that, a short time after that, Staniels came to you, and reported about Wells wanting him to tell the woman to skip?" Objection was made by appellant, and, of course, sustained. There was not the slightest excuse for asking this question. In fact, there was injected into it an apology for asking it. What, then, was its purpose? Clearly, to take an unfair advantage of appellant by intimating to the jury something that was either not true, or not capable of being proven in the manner attempted. And the wrong was not remedied because the court sustained an objection to the question. Counsel undoubtedly knew beforehand that the objection would be sustained. The inexcusable asking of the foregoing question would not be, perhaps, of itself, sufficient ground for reversing the judgment; but it is of importance when taken in connection with questions asked the defendant when a witness, as showing the general manner and temper with which the prosecution was conducted. Upon cross-examination of appellant the prosecuting attorney asked him these questions: "Where did you formerly reside? Do you know the Highland National Bank of Newberg, New York? Were you married to your present wife when you came here with her? Did not you admit in a letter to Mr. M. C. Beeknap that in November, 1893 you forged your father-in-law's name to a note in New York?" To these questions counsel for appellant objected as incompetent, immaterial, irrelevant, and not in cross-examination; declared that they were unfair to appellant; and asked the court to instruct the district attorney not to ask any more such questions. The record merely shows that after discussion the objections were sustained. The first three of these questions are important mainly as leading up to the last one, the asking of which was utterly inexcusable and reprehensible.

It would be an impeachment of the legal learning of the counsel for the people to intimate that he did not know the question to be improper, and wholly unjustifiable. Its only purpose, therefore, was to get before the jury a statement, in the guise of a question, that would prejudice them against appellant. If counsel had no reason to believe the truth of the matter insinuated by the question, then the artifice was most flagrant; but if he had any reason to believe in its truth, still he knew that it was a matter which the jury had no right to consider. The prosecuting attorney may well be assumed to be a man of fair standing before the jury, and they may well have thought that he would not have asked the question unless he could have proved what it intimated if he had been allowed to do so. He said plainly to the jury what Hamlet did not want his friends to say: "As, 'well we know;' or, 'we could, an if we would;' or, 'if we list to speak;' or, 'there be, an if there might.'" This was an entirely unfair way to try the case; and the mischief was not averted because the court properly sustained the objection,—though we think it should have warned counsel against the course which he was taking,—and instructed the jury specially on the subject. The wrong and the harm was in the asking of the question. Of course, in trials of criminal cases, questions as to the admissibility of evidence will frequently arise about which lawyers and judges may fairly differ in opinion; and in such cases defendants must be satisfied when courts sustain their objections. But where the prosecuting attorney asks a defendant questions which he knows, and every judge and lawyer knows, to be wholly inadmissible and wrong, and where the questions are asked without the expectation of answers, and where the clear purpose is to prejudice the jury against the defendant in a vital matter by the mere asking of the questions, then a judgment against the defendant will be reversed, although objections to the questions were sustained, unless it appears that the questions could not have influenced the verdict.

These views have been substantially announced several times by this court and by courts of sister states. In People v. Devine, 95 Cal. 231, 30 Pac. 378, the court, through Sharpstein, J., say: "We agree with appellant's counsel that 'the statements, questions, and remarks of the district attorney were peculiarly calculated to prejudice the substantial rights of the defendant.' We think what was said by this court in People v. Lee Chuck, 78 Cal. 327, 20 Pac. 719, and People v. Bowers, 79 Cal. 415, 21 Pac. 752, peculiarly applicable to the conduct of the district attorney in this case, and we hope the court may not again have occasion to animadvert upon similar conduct of a prosecuting officer." And in a concurring opinion by De Haven, J., the views heretofore stated are fully expressed, and a number of authorities cited to the point. In People v. Ah Len, 92 Cal. 282, 28 Pac. 286, the judgment was reversed for conduct of the prosecuting attorney not more censurable than that in the case at bar; and in that case the trial court warned the jury specially upon the subject. In People v. Bowers, 79 Cal. 415, 21 Pac. 752, the court say: "Still more objectionable was the conduct of the district attorney. It is true the court properly interfered, rebuking the attorney, and instructing the jury to pay no attention to the statements. But the statements were well calculated to influence the jury in a case of this character, and it is impossible for us to say that no injury resulted to the defendant therefrom." In People v. Lee Chuck, 78 Cal. 329, 20 Pac. 719, the court say: "Equally with the court, the district attorney, as the representative of law and justice, should be fair and impartial. He should remember that it is not his sole duty to convict, and that to use his official position to obtain a verdict by illegitimate and unfair means is to bring his office and the courts into distrust." In People v. Mullings, 83 Cal. 138, 23 Pac. 229, the judgment was reversed because certain improper questions were asked the defendant when a witness, and it was contended that no injury was done because they were answered in the negative; but the court said: "It is quite evident that the questions, and not the answers, were what the prosecution thought important. The purpose of the questions clearly was to keep persistently before the jury the assumption of damaging facts which could not be proven, and thus impress upon their minds the probability of the existence of the assumed facts upon which the questions were based. To say that such a course would not be prejudicial to defendant is to ignore human experience and the dictates of common sense." In the foregoing cases the facts were not precisely like those in the case before us; but the principle applied there is equally applicable here. The main difference is that in those cases the statement of the obnoxious matter was in a different form from that employed in the case at bar. The following are some of the cases on the point from other states: Gale v. People, 26 Mich. 161; People v. Cahoon, 88 Mich. 456, 50 N. W. 384; Leahy v. State, 31 Neb. 566, 48 N. W. 390; Tucker v. Henniker, 41 N. H. 317; State v. Trott, 36 Mo. App. 29. In the last case the supreme court of Missouri says: "The state's attorney must have known that the answer called for by the question was inadmissible, and, if he knew it, the putting of such a question to the accused was so unfair and improper that it may well be doubted whether it could be deemed to have been cured by the prompt action which the court took."

The only question, then, is whether or not we can see from the record that the conduct of the prosecuting attorney did not prejudice the appellant; and we certainly cannot see that it did not. The main evidence in the case was the testimony against appellant of Ollie Hutchings, acknowledged to be not only an accomplice, but the principal in the alleged crime, and the testimony of appellant in his own behalf. Therefore the credibility of appellant was a most important matter in the case, and whatever tended to impair that credibility was material in the highest degree; and that the conduct of the prosecuting attorney so tended is entirely clear. It is too much the habit of prosecuting officers to assume beforehand that a defendant is guilty, and then expect to have the established rules of evidence twisted, and all the features of a fair trial distorted, in order to secure a conviction. If a defendant cannot be fairly convicted, he should not be convicted at all; and to hold otherwise would be to provide ways and means for the conviction of the innocent. There are no other points likely to arise on another trial, although it may be proper to say that appellant's motion to strike out certain answers of the witness Leavitt should have been granted after it had appeared that the declaration of appellant which he swore to was not made to him, but to his partner. Judgment and order reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PEOPLE v. CHUEY YING GIT et al. (No. 21,013.)

INDICTMENT — DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY — DATE OF CRIME — EVIDENCE.

1. An indictment for robbery, describing the property stolen as "money, jewelry, and hair ornaments," no demurrer or objection to evidence being taken, is good on motion to arrest judgment, under Pen. Code, § 967, providing that, in an indictment for larceny of money, it is enough to allege the larceny to be of money, without specifying the coin, number, denomination, or kind thereof.

2. The parties being Chinese, and the prosecuting witness having testified that the crime took place on a certain Chinese date; that she knew nothing of the American dates, but that it was the day before she made complaint,—the district attorney, in order to fix the date, may put in evidence the complaint.

3. Evidence as to the disappearance and present whereabouts of prosecuting witness' daughter, who had left home the day of the robbery, was immaterial, where it appeared that one defendant that day called on prosecuting witness, at her home, and told her that her daughter was at his house; that thereupon witness went with him to his house, and there, as she and others swore, was robbed of her money and jewels. Nor could there be prejudice when another witness testified that he had at that time taken said daughter away to a correct and lawful residence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. Conklin, Judge.

Chuey Ying Git, Woo Ah Woy, and Chung Ki Foon, being accused of robbery of Ah Bow, the two latter were convicted, and appeal. Affirmed.

Mahon & Laird and J. A. Haralson, for appellants. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SEARLS, C. The appellants were accused by information of the crime of robbery, and, upon a trial, Woo Ah Woy and Chung Ki Foon were convicted. The appeal is prosecuted from the final judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

The first objection to the judgment is that the court erred in rendering judgment against the defendants in the case "because the information upon which said defendants were tried and convicted did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense." The information is in all respects in consonance with the usual form in cases of robbery, except that the only description of the property taken is as follows: "Personal property, to wit, money, jewelry, and hair ornaments." There is no demurrer interposed to the information, no objections to testimony upon the ground of the insufficiency of the information, and no motion in arrest of judgment. All objections appearing upon the face of the indictment must be taken by demurrer, "except that the objection to the jurisdiction of the court over the subject of the indictment or information, or that the facts stated do not constitute a public offense, may be taken at the trial, under the plea of not guilty, or after the trial in arrest of judgment." Pen. Code, § 1012. In People v. Swenson, 49 Cal. 338, the indictment was as follows: "Of the crime of an assault with intent to commit murder, committed as follows, to wit, the said C. G. T. Swenson, on or about * * *, did assault, with intent to commit murder, one Benjamin Cook." Defendant failed to demur to the indictment, but did move in arrest of judgment. This court held that by failing to demur the defendant had waived the objection, and could not move in arrest of judgment on the ground that the indictment did not conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code, and that, as the indictment contained a sufficient charge of an assault, the judgment could not be arrested on the ground of not stating facts constituting a public offense. "Robbery is the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another, from his person or immediate presence and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear." Pen. Code, § 211. It includes larceny, and under the indictment the defendant may be found guilty of larceny. People v. Jones, 53 Cal. 58. Robbery and grand larceny, when the property is taken from the person of another, or when the property taken is a horse, etc., do not depend upon the value of the property taken. Pen. Code, § 487. Hence, it was unnecessary to specify the value of the personal property taken. People v. Townsley, 39 Cal. 405; State v. Burke, 73 N. C. 83. The authorities hold, almost universally, that the description of the property taken in robbery is required to be equally specific with that required in larceny. Prior to the amendment of 1880 to our Penal Code, a much greater degree of particularity was required in this respect than at present. By section 967, it is now provided that in an indictment or information for the larceny or embezzlement of money, bank notes, etc., it is sufficient "to allege the larceny or embezzlement * * * to be of money, bank notes, * * * without specifying the coin, number, denomination or kind thereof." This statute does not, in terms, apply to cases of robbery, but as the latter crime is but larceny from the person, accomplished by force or fear, and as the same reasons exist for the modification of the rule in such cases, it may well be held that a rule which often required impossibilities in description, the existence of which courts often regretted, as tending to thwart rather than promote justice, should be modified. Be this, however, as it may, after judgment in an action without objection, whether in a civil or criminal case, a pleading which states a cause of action or offense, but states it defectively, cannot be successfully attacked. It is not, in such cases, a defective allegation, but a total lack of allegation, which renders the judgment void, and hence open to attack. There is here an attempt to describe the personal property taken,—a lame one, it must be confessed,—but, imperfect though it be, it is nevertheless such a one as will support a judgment. Wharton on Criminal Pleading and Practice, quoting Blackburn, J., says "that where an averment which is necessary to support a particular part of the pleading has been imperfectly stated, and a verdict on an issue involving that averment is found, and it appears to the court, after verdict, that unless this averment were true the verdict could not be sustained, in such case the verdict cures the defective averment, which might have been had on demurrer," and in this respect there is no distinction between the pleadings in civil and criminal proceedings. Section 760; People v. Swenson, supra. A review of the cases, coupled with the phraseology of our Code, leads to the conclusion that the defect in the information was waived by the defendant. Had objection been made at the trial to testimony describing the property taken from the prosecuting witness, upon the ground that it was not sufficiently described in the information, its admission might have been made the basis of error on a motion for new trial, but no objection on this ground was interposed.

At the trial the prosecuting witness described the robbery as having taken place on the "Chinese October 26th," and stated that she knew nothing of the American date, but that it was the day before she made and filed the complaint against defendants. Thereupon the district attorney, for the purpose of "fixing the date upon which the transaction was said to have occurred," offered in evidence the complaint made and filed against the defendants. The court admitted it for the purpose indicated, and the ruling is assigned as error. It was admissible as evidence for the purpose in view.

The court, at the trial, made several rulings excluding testimony in reference to the disappearance and whereabouts of a young daughter of the prosecuting witness, who, it seems, had disappeared on the day of the commission of the alleged offense, and these rulings are assigned as error. It appears that, on the night of the alleged offense, Chuey Ying Git, one of the defendants, called upon Ah Bow, the prosecuting witness, at her home in Bakersfield, and informed her that her girl was down at his house, and that thereupon she accompanied Ying Git to his house, where, according to her statement, she did not find her daughter, and where, as she testified, as do two other witnesses, the defendants, by force and violence, robbed her of her money and jewels. The proffered testimony in reference to the daughter was not pertinent to any issue in the case, and its exclusion was not error. Had it been otherwise, the error would have been cured by the testimony of the witness Brown, who seems to have a mission school, and who, in reply to a question by a juror, stated that he and his wife had taken the girl away, and sent her to a "good Christian home in San Francisco, and the girl is there now, [at the time of the trial,] comfortable and happy." The theory that the charge against the defendants grew out of the disappearance of this girl, in the face of the positive evidence of robbery against the defendants, is farfetched, and entitled to little consideration.

The other objections to evidence are not of sufficient importance to require comment. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

DREW v. ROGERS. (No. 18,245.)

CHIEF OF POLICE—ELECTION—QUALIFICATION.

Where one, without the qualification of being a citizen of the United States, has been elected to the office of chief of police of a city, the election will be annulled, and his certificate canceled.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VanFleet, Judge.

Proceeding by Moses M. Drew against John B. Rogers to contest defendant's right to the office of chief of police. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robert T. & Wm. H. Devlin and Brusie & Layson, for appellant. Johnson, Johnson & Johnson and C. T. Jones, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. On March 8, 1892, there was a general municipal election in the city of Sacramento, at which the defendant, Rogers, received the highest number of votes for the office of chief of police of that city. He received a certificate of election, and entered upon the duties of the office. This proceeding was brought in the superior court, under section 1111 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, to contest the right of said Rogers to hold said office, upon the ground that he was not eligible thereto at the time of said election. The court found that he was not eligible, and entered judgment annulling the election and canceling the said certificate. From this judgment Rogers appeals.

The appellant was born in Australia, of British parents, and came with them to this country when a child; and the question before the court was whether or not he had become a citizen of the United States 90 days before the election. He contends that he had at that time become a citizen—First, because his father, Thomas H. Baxter, was naturalized before appellant was 21 years old; and, second, because, while he was a minor, his mother, Mary Baxter, married one W. A. Rogers, who was a native-born citizen. As to the first of these contentions, the court found that appellant's father was not naturalized until after appellant had attained his majority; and the evidence upon that point was such, to say the least of it, as to leave no room for disturbing the finding. As to the second contention, the court finds that at the time of the alleged marriage of Mary Baxter to W. A. Rogers the husband of the former, Thomas H. Baxter, was living, and continued to live until after the death of said Mary; and that, while they had separated, they were never divorced; and this finding is clearly warranted by the evidence. Appellant contends that the law to sustain the second marriage will presume a divorce, but it is not necessary to inquire into the correctness or extent of such presumption, for the court finds that, independent of the absence of proof of divorce, there never was any marriage between appellant's mother and said W. A. Rogers; and we cannot say that the evidence does not warrant such finding. There are no other points in the case which we deem necessary to be noticed. As remarked by the learned judge of the court below, it is perhaps unfortunate that the judgment is not in harmony with the choice of a majority of the voters as expressed at the time of said election, but the will of the people can be exercised only by the methods and within the limitations prescribed in their constitution and laws. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

SAN LUIS OBISPO COUNTY v. PETTIT et al. (No. 19,287.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 21, 1893.)
COUNTY TREASURER—MISAPPROPRIATION OF FUNDS—ESTOPPEL.

A county auditor, as required by the county government act, (section 115,) settled the accounts of a tax collector, certified to the treasurer the amount payable into the county treasury, and, on the presentation and filing of the treasurer's receipt therefor, discharged the collector, and charged the treasurer with the amount. The county treasurer gave his receipt to the collector, and charged himself with the amount in his official books; and in making his monthly settlements with the auditor, as required by section 80, he made a sworn statement that he had received such amount from the collector, and that it was then on hand. Held, that the treasurer was estopped by his receipt and his statement under oath to deny the receipt of such amount from the collector.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action by the county of San Luis Obispo against B. F. Pettit and others on the official bond of said Pettit as county treasurer. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wilcoxon & Bouldin and McD. R. Venable, for appellants. F. A. Dorn, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant Pettit was elected treasurer of the county of San Luis Obispo at the general election in 1890 for the term of two years, and held his office until January, 1893. June 2, 1891, the other defendants became sureties on his official bond for the faithful performance by him of all his official duties. The present action was brought to recover the sum of $2,316.19, which it is alleged had been misappropriated or lost by Pettit while it was in his possession as such treasurer. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff and the defendants have appealed. The facts upon which the judgment was given are as follows: One Madison Graves was a license tax collector for the county, and by virtue of a county ordinance imposing license taxes collected various sums of money for the county, which it was his duty to pay into the county treasury. On the 1st of August, 1892, Graves made a settlement with the county auditor for the license taxes that had been collected by him, and such settlement showed that he had at that time in his possession $2,927.21 of license tax money collected by him and belonging to the county, and the county auditor issued to him a certificate showing that he had made such settlement, and that the above amount was due to the county. Graves delivered this certificate to Pettit on or about the 30th of September, 1892, and on the 4th of October, Pettit, as county treasurer, delivered to the auditor of the county a receipt, showing that he had received from Graves this sum of money. Thereupon the auditor made entries in his books charging Pettit with the amount mentioned in the receipt, and crediting Graves with the same amount; and entries were afterwards made by Pettit in the county treasurer's books, charging himself, as treasurer, with said sum, as having been received from Graves by him on account of license taxes. On the 1st of December, 1892, when the official count of the money in the treasury was made, there was a shortage of $2,316.19 in the moneys which should have been in the treasury, and when Pettit, at the expiration of his term, handed over to his successor the moneys in the treasury, there still remained this deficiency according to his books.

It is alleged by the sureties in their answer as a defense to the action that at the time when the receipt was given to the auditor, Graves did not in fact pay over the money therein named, except about $400, and that he has never paid any other portion thereof; and in support of this averment evidence was offered at the trial that at the time the receipt was given to the auditor Pettit had not received any of the money therein named, but that he delivered the receipt at the request of Graves, and upon his agreement that he would subsequently give him a check for the amount; that he did afterwards receive from Graves his check upon a local bank for the sum of $2,500, which he still held, for the reason that Graves had stopped its payment. Pettit made entries in his books in the early part of October to the effect that he had received this amount of money, and on the first of each month thereafter during his term made his sworn statement to the auditor, as required by law, that this amount of money was in his hands as treasurer of the county. Upon these facts it is contended by the sureties that, as Pettit did not receive the money from Graves, they are not liable upon his bond, and that Graves, and not Pettit, is indebted to the county for the amount of the check. Graves, however, testifies positively that he paid this entire sum of money to Pettit, as county treasurer, prior to October 4, 1892. But, assuming that the facts were as claimed by the appellants, we are of the opinion that they do not constitute a defense to the action. Section 115 of the county government act (St. 1891, p. 323) requires the county auditor to settle the accounts of all persons holding moneys payable into the county treasury, and to certify the amount to the treasurer; and provides that upon the presentation and filing of the treasurer's receipt therefor, he shall give to such persons a discharge, and charge the treasurer with the amount received by him. In Butte Co. v. Morgan, 76 Cal. 1, 18 Pac. 115, it was held that "the auditor is not required to go to the treasurer and ask him whether the amount has been actually paid; or, in other words, whether the receipt states the truth. He is authorized to accept the receipt as sufficient evidence of the fact of payment." This case presents many points similar to the present one, and must be regarded as controlling. Section 80 of the county government act requires the treasurer to settle his accounts with the auditor on the first Monday of each month, and, for the purpose of making such settlement, to make a statement under oath of the amount of money received prior to the period of such settlement, the sources whence the same was derived, and the amount remaining on hand. These settlements and statements were made by Pettit, and he ought not now to be permitted to exonerate himself from liability to the county by showing that these statements were false, and that, instead of requiring Graves to pay this money into the treasury, he had taken his individual promise to pay it at a subsequent date. By delivering to the auditor his receipt for the moneys which Graves had collected, he had authorized the auditor to enter upon his books a discharge of Graves' liability, and is thereby estopped from questioning the correctness of his receipt. If he chose to permit Graves to retain this money upon his promise to subsequently pay it to him, to that extent he failed to perform his official duty in requiring the money to be paid into the treasury, and must be regarded as having become himself, rather than the county, the creditor of Graves. If any loss occurred by reason of Graves' subsequent failure to pay his check, it should be borne by Pettit, rather than by the county, since the loss had been made possible by reason of Pettit's violation of his official duty; and his sureties are liable to the county equally with him for such misappropriation or loss of the money.

Whatever defect there was in the complaint by reason of its uncertainty was cured by the answer of the defendants, in which they allege that the amount of money for which this receipt was given, and which they allege was not paid, is the same money as that which is claimed in the action. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; PATERSON, J.

CITY OF SAN LUIS OBISPO v. BRIZZOLARA et al. (No. 19,216.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 21, 1893.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—EVIDENCE OF DAMAGES.

To show the market value of land condemned, the report of commissioners appointed to assess neighboring land, reciting the price to be paid for neighboring land, and the consideration which determined such report, is irrelevant.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Proceedings by the city of San Luis Obispo against Mariana Brizzolara and others to condemn land. Judgment for defendants for $6,500. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wm. Shipsey, for appellant. Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Proceedings to condemn certain lands for a public street in the city of San Luis Obispo. The jury assessed the value of the land taken from the defendants at $6,500. The plaintiff moved for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was not sustained by the evidence. The court below was of this opinion, but held that the evidence would support a verdict for $5,000, and made an order that, if the defendants would remit $1,500, a new trial should be denied. The defendants having remitted that amount, the court denied a new trial, and the plaintiff has appealed.

We have carefully examined the record, and are unable to concur with the views of the learned judge of the court below. The land sought to be taken for the street has a frontage of 18 feet and 10 inches on Monterey street, and the highest estimate placed upon its value by any witness who testified upon the subject is $200 per front foot. Other witnesses estimated its value at a much lower amount. Some of the witnesses for the defendants stated that they estimated the land upon that side of the creek as worth about 25 per cent. more than land upon the other side, and one of them said that if he was to buy this property he would pay from 20 to 25 per cent. more than he would for property on the other side of the creek. Neither of these witnesses, however, gave any evidence of the value of the land on either side of the creek, and the only testimony of the value of the land upon the other side was that of the witness Warden, who said that he gave $150 a foot for it. The defendants introduced in evidence the report of the commissioners who had been appointed to determine its value, under the statute by virtue of which the proceedings were had, (St. 1889, p. 70,) from which it appeared that they had awarded to the owner of 10 feet of land on the other side of the creek, which had been taken under the same proceeding, the sum of $3,750, which was made up as follows: Land taken, $2,500; damages to improvements, $1,000; damages to realty affected, $250,—and that they had also awarded to these defendants, for the land in question, $3,900. These commissioners were also witnesses at the trial, and testified that the value of the land in question was $150 a front foot. They also stated that they had allowed the sum of $3,900 to the defendants for the reason that they were willing to pay more than the property was worth, for the sake of time and to prevent a lawsuit, and that they had been willing to pay more for the land on the other side of the creek than they thought the property was worth, in order to save a condemnation suit. We do not consider that this report of the commissioners was competent to show the value of the land in question. It has been held that, for the purpose of ascertaining the value of a piece of land, evidence may be received of sales of other parcels of land in the immediate vicinity, similarly situated, if recently made; but we have not been referred to any case in which it has been held that the value fixed by an agreement between the owner and a corporation seeking to condemn his land by virtue of eminent domain can be taken as a criterion of the market value of other land in that vicinity. As was said by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Cobb v. City of Boston, 112 Mass. 181: "The price so fixed by compromise, when there can be no other purchaser, and the seller has no option to refuse to sell, and can only elect between the acceptance of the price offered and the delay, uncertainty, and trouble of legal proceedings for an assessment, is not a reasonable or fair test of market value. It is in no sense a sale in the market." Mr. Lewis, in his treatise on Eminent Domain, (section 447,) says: "What the party condemning has paid for other property is incompetent. Such sales are not a fair criterion of value, for the reason that they are in the nature of a compromise. The fear of one party or the other to take the risk of legal proceedings ordinarily results in the one party paying more, or the other taking less, than is considered to be the fair market value of the property. For these reasons, such sales would not seem to be competent evidence of value in any case, whether in a proceeding by the same condemning party, or otherwise." See, also, City of Springfield v. Schmook, 68 Mo. 394; Railroad Co. v. McLaren, 47 Ga. 546; Fall River Print Works v. Fall River, 110 Mass. 428; In re Thompson, 127 N. Y. 463, 28 N. E. 389; Railroad Co. v. Pearson, 35 Cal. 262. In Waterworks v. Drinkhouse, 92 Cal. 532, 28 Pac. 681, where the court had endeavored to ascertain the value of the property sought to be condemned, and a witness had been asked how much the plaintiff had paid for other lands, we said: "However the rule may be in other states, it is settled here that such facts are not admissible as evidence in chief, but only by way of cross-examination, for the purpose of testing the fairness or honesty of an opinion which the witness may have given upon his direct examination, in relation to the value of the property involved in the action." In the present case the above evidence was proper in cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses, for the purpose of testing the accuracy and honesty of the opinions which they had given of the value of the land in their direct examination; but, as it would not have been admissible as affirmative evidence for the purpose of establishing the value of the land in question, it was not competent for the court to consider it for that purpose, even though properly brought before it in cross-examination. It may be added that, even if it had been competent evidence of the value of the land for which the price was given, it would not sustain the conclusion of the court. The judgment and order are reversed, and the court is directed to grant a new trial on this issue.

COLLINS et al. v. SCOTT et al. (No. 17,174.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 21, 1893.)

MORTGAGE ON HOMESTEAD—FORECLOSURE—
PARTIES—RIGHTS OF CHILDREN—VACATION OF DECREE—FRAUD—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. Error in striking out parts of a complaint is waived by the subsequent filing of an amended complaint.

2. Under Civil Code, § 1265, providing that, upon the death of one of the spouses, the homestead vests in the survivor if it had been selected from community property, the children of homesteaders, upon the death of their father, acquire no interest by succession as his heirs at law in a homestead so selected, and hence no equity vests in them to redeem from the foreclosure of a mortgage on such homestead.

3. As an inducement to the signing by the wife of a mortgage on the homestead, the mortgagee agreed to convey to the wife and her children, in case of foreclosure, either a part of the mortgaged premises, or other land. Held, that the mortgagee's failure to so convey was no ground for the vacation of a decree foreclosing the mortgage, as the wife and children had an adequate remedy at law to enforce the agreement.

4. As under Civil Code, § 1265, the title to a homestead selected from community property vests, on the death of one of the spouses, in the survivor, the heirs of a deceased spouse are not necessary parties defendant to an action to foreclose a mortgage on the homestead, brought after the death of such spouse.

5. The fact that the mortgagee of a homestead, who, as an inducement to the signing of the mortgage by the wife, had agreed to convey to the wife and her children, in case of foreclosure, certain land, told the administrator of the husband and the attorney for the children, prior to instituting proceedings to foreclose, that there was no defense to foreclosure, does not constitute fraud on his part, and is no ground for the vacation of a decree of foreclosure.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county.

Action by Orville E. Collins and others against Angelia R. Scott and another to procure the vacation of a judgment foreclosing a mortgage, and all proceedings thereunder. From a judgment for defendants, entered upon an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Henry E. Highton, for appellants. Galpin & Zeigler, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This action is brought to procure a vacation, as to the plaintiffs, of a judgment of foreclosure and all proceedings thereunder, including a sale of the mortgaged premises, to have a certificate of sale and a sheriff's deed declared void, for an accounting by the purchaser and his successor in interest of the rents and profits, and for a decree allowing plaintiffs to redeem the undivided three-tenths of said mortgaged premises on paying a like three-tenths of the amount found due upon an accounting on said mortgage, etc. A demurrer was interposed to the amended complaint of plaintiffs, which was sustained by the court, and, upon plaintiffs' failure to amend, final judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, from which judgment plaintiffs appeal.

There is a bill of exceptions in the record, taken to the action of the court in striking out portions of the original complaint, but, as an amended complaint was subsequently filed, the error, if any, in the order striking out was thereby waived. Were it otherwise, the portion stricken out is substantially inserted, and at greater length, in the amended complaint.

The demurrer was based upon a failure of the amended complaint to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and this is the only question presented for consideration. The following synopsis of the allegations of the complaint are deemed sufficient to illustrate its salient points: On the 12th day of January, 1877, Lemuel P. Collins and Cymantha O. Collins, his wife, executed to Salvin P. Collins a mortgage upon two parcels of land situate in Santa Clara county, to secure the payment by Lemuel P. Collins to said Salvin P. Collins, mortgagee, of $10,000, with interest at 1 per cent. per month from date, and payable on or before January 12, 1878. The mortgaged property was community property of the mortgagors, Lemuel P. Collins and Cymantha O. Collins, his wife, a homestead having been duly declared thereon under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California. Cymantha O. Collins was possessed of separate estate and property, and, in purchasing the land mortgaged, Lemuel P. Collins, her husband, had used over $5,000 of his said wife's funds in paying the purchase price of said land, for which sum he was indebted to her at the date of the mortgage. Salvin P. Collins, the mortgagee, knew the foregoing facts and for the purpose of inducing Cymantha O. Collins, the wife, to unite in the execution of the mortgage, and for her benefit, and for the benefit of the children of herself and of her husband, at and immediately before the execution of the mortgage, promised and agreed with the mortgagors and their children that if she, the said Cymantha, would unite in the execution of the mortgage to him, he would, in the event of an action to foreclose and sell the mortgaged premises, set apart and convey to the said Cymantha and her children a sufficient quantity of the mortgaged land, or land in some other part of the county of Santa Clara, in or near to San Jose, to an amount in value of not less than $2,000, to be secured and conveyed as a homestead for said Cymantha O. Collins and her children, and for their use and benefit. This has not been done. Lemuel P. Collins died intestate on the 27th day of May, 1879, leaving as heirs Cymantha O. Collins, his wife, and the plaintiffs herein, their children, all then infants, and two daughters by a former marriage. On or about July 12, 1879, Salvin P. Collins, the mortgagee, procured one John T. Bury to be appointed administrator of the estate of Lemuel P. Collins, deceased, and with the fraudulent intent of avoiding his said agreement in regard to a conveyance of the value of $2,000, and without the knowledge of plaintiffs, who were infants, falsely represented to the administrator that there was no defense to his mortgage, and thereupon brought an action to foreclose said mortgage. It is further charged that with like fraudulent intent he procured one Charles F. Wilcox, an attorney at law, to be appointed and to appear as an attorney for the infant plaintiffs herein, and for their brother, now deceased, to whom he made like declarations, and the administrator and attorney, believing the representations to be true, made no defense to an action which said Salvin P. Collins brought to foreclose his mortgage, and judgment of foreclosure was entered in favor of plaintiff and against the infant children, who, it is to be inferred, were, but who are not directly stated to have been, made defendants in the action. On the 17th day of February, 1880, an order of sale issued in the foreclosure proceedings, under which the mortgaged premises were sold on the 15th day of March, 1880, and purchased by Salvin P. Collins, the mortgagee, for the amount found due him under his judgment of foreclosure, who received a certificate of sale, and thereafter, and on the 20th day of September, 1880, a deed of the premises. Plaintiffs knew nothing of the foreclosure proceedings, and had no opportunity to redeem from the foreclosure sale, or to enforce the agreement made by Salvin P. Collins. Said Salvin P. Collins, upon receiving a sheriff's deed, entered into possession of the premises, and he and his successors in interest have received, since that date, the rents and profits thereof. Salvin P. Collins departed this life August 28, 1884, leaving a last will, whereby the premises in question were devised to his wife, and such proceedings were had that in September, 1885, the property was distributed to his widow, who has intermarried with Emerson W. Scott, and they are husband and wife, and the defendants in this action. One of the children of Lemuel P. Collins and Cymantha O. Collins, L. P. Collins, died under age, and said Cymantha has been duly appointed his administratrix, as well as guardian of John A. Collins, who is under the age of 21 years.

The whole question of the sufficiency of the amended complaint must turn upon the rights acquired by plaintiffs under the agreement made at and immediately before the execution and delivery of the mortgage. A homestead having been declared upon the community property prior to the execution of the mortgage, when Lemuel P. Collins, the husband of Cymantha O. Collins, died, on the 27th day of May, 1879, the homestead became the sole property of his surviving wife. Civil Code, § 1265; Sanders v. Russell, 86 Cal. 119, 24 Pac. 852; Mawson v. Mawson, 50 Cal. 539; Estate of Headen, 52 Cal. 295; Gagliardo v. Dumont, 54 Cal. 496; Herrold v. Reen, 58 Cal. 443; Rich v. Tubbs, 41 Cal. 34; Watson v. His Creditors, 58 Cal. 556. These remarks are indulged for the purpose of showing that the plaintiffs here acquired no interest in the property in question by succession as the heirs at law of their deceased father, and can only rely upon the agreement in support of their cause of action. This agreement may be succinctly stated thus: In consideration of Cymantha O. Collins executing with her husband a mortgage upon their homestead, Salvin P. Collins, the mortgagee, promised them and their children that, in the event of an action to foreclose and sell the mortgaged premises, he would set aside and convey to Cymantha and her children, land of the value of $2,000, either out of the mortgaged premises, or elsewhere in the county, in or near San Jose, as and for a homestead. There is no suggestion that this agreement was incorporated in or made any part of the mortgage. It was not a promise whereby a lien was created upon the mortgaged premises, for the reason, among others, that it was not a promise to convey a portion of the mortgaged premises, but left it optional to convey such portion, or other land, at the option of the promisor. It was a promise to other parties than those included in the mortgage; an agreement for the benefit of the mother and her children. It was a personal promise to plaintiffs and their mother, having no relation to the mortgage, except that the execution of the latter constituted the consideration for it. If the offer to convey was a part of the negotiations leading up to the execution of the mortgage, and a part of the mortgage contract, then we must presume it was all merged in the written mortgage as executed, and that instrument contains the final determination of the parties. But this theory is not in accord with the allegations of the complaint or the contention of appellant. That contention is that the agreement was separate and distinct from the mortgage, but constituted a defense to it which, by the fraudulent representations of the mortgagee, they were prevented from setting up in the foreclosure proceedings. We cannot concur in this view, but regard the agreement, if a valid one, as giving to the plaintiffs, upon its breach, a right to an action at law. Their right was not to defeat a foreclosure, but to have a conveyance of land of the value of at least $2,000. This right was not a condition precedent to the mortgagee's right to a foreclosure, but a right to enforce which they had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law. As heirs at law of the mortgagor, Lemuel P. Collins, these plaintiffs were not necessary parties to the action to foreclose, (Bayly v. Muehe, 65 Cal. 345, 3 Pac. 467, and 4 Pac. 486; Monterey Co. v. Cushing, 83 Cal. 507, 23 Pac. 700;) and whether or not they were made parties defendant in that action is of no moment. To entitle a defendant to relief against a judgment or decree on the ground of fraud, it must appear that he had a good defense on the merits, and that such defense has been lost to him without fault on his part. Freem. Judgm. (4th Ed.) § 486; People v. Rains, 23 Cal. 128; Harnish v. Bramer, 71 Cal. 155, 11 Pac. 888; Gregory v. Ford, 14 Cal. 139; Gibbons v. Scott, 15 Cal. 285; Logan v. Hillegas, 16 Cal. 201.

If we are correct in our conclusion that the agreement on the part of the mortgagee to convey land to plaintiffs and their mother was an independent contract, then the facts, as stated in the complaint, showed no fraud upon the part of the mortgagee in representing to the administrator and to the attorney of plaintiffs that there was no defense to the action to foreclose. On the contrary, we think he formed and stated a correct conclusion, and, treated as advice, it was sound and salutary. Treated as a bill to redeem, the complaint cannot be sustained.

1. As the title to the homestead vested in the mother of the plaintiffs upon the death of their father, no equity of redemption vested in them.

2. The statutory right to redeem was in the administrator or the mother, or in both, and was restricted to the six months provided by the statute. Code Civil Proc. § 702. The cases of Hall v. Arnott, 80 Cal. 348, 22 Pac. 200, Warder v. Enslen, 73 Cal. 291, 14 Pac. 874, and Raynor v. Drew, 72 Cal. 311, 13 Pac. 866, cited by appellant, were all cases in which no foreclosure had been had, and hence cases in which there was no statutory bar to the action. No doubt, an action to redeem a mortgage of real property, with or without an account of the rents and profits, may be brought by the mortgagor or those claiming under him against the mortgagee or those claiming under him, unless he or they have continuously maintained an adverse possession of the mortgaged premises for five years after breach of some condition of the mortgage, as contended by appellants. Code Civil Proc. § 346; De Cazara v. Orena, 80 Cal. 132, 22 Pac. 74. This section of the Code applies, however, to cases in which there has been no foreclosure of the mortgage and equity of redemption; and where, as in the present case, there has been a foreclosure valid against the interests of the infant plaintiffs (if any they had) by making the administrator of the estate, during the pendency of administration proceedings, a party defendant, no such right remains after the expiration of six months from the sale under the foreclosure proceedings, except in those cases in which some fraud has intervened, rendering the decree and sale thereunder voidable. The original complaint in the cause is set out in the record, and is referred to by counsel for appellants in his brief. It was superseded by the amended complaint, upon which the judgment appealed from was rendered, and thenceforth filled no office as a pleading. As evidence of the date at which suit is brought, and for a few other purposes, such a pleading may sometimes be properly used. Gilman v. Cosgrove, 22 Cal. 357; Barber v. Reynolds, 33 Cal. 497; Kelly v. McKibben, 54 Cal. 192; Kentfield v. Hayes, 57 Cal. 409; Johnson v. Powers, 65 Cal. 179, 3 Pac. 625. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

In re VANCE'S ESTATE. (No. 15,349.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 19, 1893.)
HOMESTEAD—HOW BARRED—CONVEYANCE OF ALL INTEREST AS HEIR.

An instrument executed by testator's widow recited that in consideration of $50,000, the amount of her legacy, paid her by one of the heirs, she conveyed to him all her interest in testator's estate; that such instrument was a conveyance of her interest both as legatee and as widow or heir if the will were revoked. Held not to bar her right to a probate homestead, as a widow's right to probate homestead is not an interest in land, and consequently was not embraced in the conveyance.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Settlement of the estate of John Vance, deceased. Phoebe A. Vance applied for an admeasurement to her of a probate homestead in decedent's land and from an order granting the application the executors of decedent's will appeal. Affirmed.

E. W. Wilson, for appellants. A. J. Monroe, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from an order setting apart a probate homestead to the widow of deceased. John Vance died testate, leaving a widow and two sons, issue of a former marriage. There were no minor children. The will was duly admitted to probate, but, subsequently, S. A. Vance, one of the sons of the testator, inaugurated a contest, and asked that the probate be revoked. The value of the estate exceeded $1,000,000. The will gave the widow $50,000 in cash, but no further interest in the estate. The grounds of the contest do not appear, nor what part, if any, the widow took in it. Apparently she would have been greatly benefited by having the will defeated. However, while the contest was pending, S. A. Vance paid her $50,000, the amount of her legacy, and took from her an instrument in writing, as follows: "This indenture, made and entered into this 16th day of June, 1892, witnesseth that I, Phoebe A. Vance, the widow of John Vance, deceased, for and in consideration of the sum of fifty thousand dollars, gold coin, to me in hand paid by Silas Albert Vance, the receipt of which sum is hereby acknowledged, do hereby grant, bargain, sell, assign, transfer, and convey unto the said Silas Albert Vance, his heirs and assigns, all my right, title, claim, and interest of every kind and nature of, in, and to the real and personal property belonging to the estate of said John Vance, deceased. This is a conveyance of all my right, title, claim, and interest of, in, and to the said estate of said John Vance, deceased, both as a legatee under the last will and testament of said John Vance, deceased, and as a conveyance of all my right, title, claim, and interest of, in, and to said estate of said John Vance, deceased, as the widow and heir at law of said John Vance, deceased, in the event of the last will and testament of said John Vance, deceased, being set aside by the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal the day and year first above written." At the same time both sons of testator, who were beneficiaries under the will, executed to her the following: "In the superior court of the county of Humboldt, state of California. In the matter of the estate of John Vance, deceased. We, and each of us, hereby consent and agree that the family allowance heretofore made by said court to Phoebe A. Vance, widow of said decedent, shall continue during such time as the court may direct and order, it being understood that the conveyance this day made by Mrs. Phoebe A. Vance to Silas Albert Vance of her interest in the estate of John Vance, deceased, shall not affect her right to said family allowance. Edgar H. Vance. S. Albert Vance. June 16, 1892." The contest seems to have been dismissed soon after, for it appears that the executors paid S. A. Vance the $50,000. The executors then applied to the court to have the allowance to the widow revoked, on the ground that she had then no interest in the estate and no longer needed it. Partly in response—apparently to this application—she applied to have the exempt property set apart to her, and to have a probate homestead set apart for her use. The court refused to discontinue the allowance, and proceeded to admeasure to her a probate homestead, which, it is found, is worth not to exceed $5,000. It is now contended that the instrument executed by the widow should prevent her from obtaining a probate homestead, as by that she conveyed the right to S. A. Vance, or waived it for a valuable consideration, and is estopped from claiming a homestead. Whether there was a sufficient consideration to support a conveyance by the widow of her interest in the estate beyond her right to the legacy, which virtually was paid, need not be considered. She received for it only what she was entitled to under the will; and though she conveyed it to S. A. Vance, the record shows that E. H. Vance also participated in the transaction. It would, indeed, be no very violent conclusion to suppose that the $50,000 paid her by S. A. Vance was the same money received by S. A. Vance from the estate; but that is not material. The first part of the instrument executed by her is sufficient in form to convey her interest in the land, if she had any. But she had no interest whatever, unless her right to have a probate homestead admeasured to her constituted an interest in the estate. In Estate of Moore, 57 Cal. 437, it was expressly decided that this right did not constitute an interest in the land. Had the will been set aside, she would have been the owner of a one-third interest. The instrument is to be construed in view of all the facts. The learned judge of the probate court held that the general language in the first part of the instrument is limited and qualified by what follows, which seems designed solely to define what her interest in the estate was. I think this construction correct. In consideration of the payment of the legacy by S. A. Vance, she assigned to him her right to receive it from the estate; and to make it more secure she conveyed to him her right as heir in case the legacy should fall by the revocation of the will. As the will was not revoked, she has conveyed no interest in the estate. If this transaction had been with one who had no interest in the estate, the deed, if it be one, could have had no further effect. As the transaction was really with her stepsons, who took all the residue of the estate, and as she had no claim save as legatee, the purpose of the transaction is unmistakable. I think, therefore, it is not necessary to decide whether a widow who has conveyed the estate of her husband after his death by a deed of bargain and sale, there being no minor children, can afterwards claim and have admeasured to her a probate homestead. I advise that the order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

HENKE v. EUREKA ENDOWMENT ASS'N
OF CALIFORNIA. (No. 15,192.)

PLEADING—COMPLAINT.

1. Where a complaint alleges that defendant is a corporation organized for the purpose of paying its members periodical installment endowments; that plaintiff became a member, and received a certificate entitling her to rights of membership, and participation in the endowment fund to the extent of $6,000, to be paid at 10 stated periods, etc.; that defendant thereupon executed a certain contract in writing, whereby it promised and agreed to pay plaintiff, on a certain date, $600, and that no part of said sum has been paid,—a demurrer on the ground of ambiguity is properly overruled, as it is clear that the cause of action is based on the written contract to pay, and the previous allegations are but inducements to the contract.

2. As Civil Code, § 1614, provides that a written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration, a special averment of a consideration is not necessary, where the complaint in an action on a contract states that it is in writing; and it is immaterial that the contract is set out according to its legal effect only, and not in haec verba.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Christena Henke against the Eureka Endowment Association of California. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Taylor & Craig, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. The respondent, Christena Henke, brought this action to recover $600. The complaint avers, in substance, that the defendant is a corporation organized and having for its object the payment to its members of certain sums of money at stated times, as periodical installment endowments; that on the 8th day of February, 1889, plaintiff became a member of said corporation defendant, and received from it, duly executed, etc., an endowment certificate by which she became and still is entitled to all the rights and privileges of membership, and to participate in the endowment fund in the amount of $6,000, to be paid at 10 stated periods, computed according to the maturity table of the constitution of defendant, in 10 respective amounts, not to exceed $600 each; that defendant thereupon duly executed a certain contract in writing, whereby it promised and agreed to pay plaintiff, on the 2d day of January, 1892, the sum of $600; that no part of said sum has been paid. Wherefore, plaintiff asks judgment for $600 and costs of suit. Defendant demurred to the complaint upon the grounds: (1) That it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. (2) That the complaint is ambiguous, in that it cannot be determined whether plaintiff seeks to recover by virtue of the endowment certificate of February 8, 1889, or by virtue of the contract. (3) That it is unintelligible, in that it does not allege any consideration for the contract to pay plaintiff $600. (4) That be determined therefrom (a) whether there is any mutuality rendering the alleged promise binding; (b) whether plaintiff ever performed the, or any, act or acts on her part necessary to perfect a cause of action upon the contract; (c) whether, according to the maturity table of the constitution of defendant, a right of action upon the promise of defendant had accrued to plaintiff. The demurrer was overruled by the court, and leave given defendant to answer. No answer was filed, and judgment was in due time entered in favor of plaintiff for $600 and costs, from which judgment defendant appeals. The case comes up on the judgment roll, and the only question made is upon the propriety of the order of the court below in overruling the demurrer.

The first contention of appellant is that no consideration is alleged in the complaint for the execution by defendant of the agreement upon which a recovery is sought. Section 1614 of the Civil Code provides that "a written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration." It is a familiar rule of pleading under our code system that every fact which a plaintiff will be called upon to prove at the trial must be averred in his complaint. It is equally a rule that presumptions of law should not, or at least need not, be stated. When the plaintiff averred in her complaint that the defendant executed a contract in writing, wherein it promised, at a given date, to pay her a certain sum of money, she stated facts from which the law presumed a consideration; hence, it was unnecessary to aver it specially. A like presumption was indulged as to sealed instruments and negotiable paper long before the adoption of our Code, and as to such instruments and paper no special averment of a consideration was necessary. McCarty v. Beach, 10 Cal. 462; Wills v. Kempt, 17 Cal. 99.

Counsel for appellant admit the force of section 1614 of the Civil Code, but contend that it only applies in those cases where the contract is set out haec verba. We do not so understand it. The practice of setting out copies of papers upon which actions were founded in the declaration did not prevail at common law, the practice being to plead an instrument according to its legal effect. Chitty, in his work on Pleadings, declares it is not necessary to aver a consideration in those cases where the law implies it, and gives a form of declaration upon a bill of exchange, in which the bill is set out according to its legal effect, and in which no consideration is averred. Bliss, in his work on Code Pleadings, after stating the rule that a consideration should be averred, except in cases where, at common law, the instrument, such as deeds and negotiable promissory notes, imported a consideration, proceeds to state the exception which prevails

In those states where by statute a different rule has been established, and, after quoting section 1614 of our Civil Code, adds: "Thus the pleader is relieved of the necessity of averring consideration, leaving the want of it to be set up as a defense, when authorized by statute." Bliss, Code Pl. §§ 268, 269. The necessity of pleading a consideration for the contract is obviated by the fact that it is in writing, and not by the mode of pleading it. The cases of Douglass v. Davie, 2 McCord, 215, and Goddard v. Fulton, 21 Cal. 437, cited by appellant, are not in point.

It is quite apparent from the complaint that the cause of action is based upon the written contract to pay, and that the allegations of membership by plaintiff in the defendant corporation, issuing to her an endowment certificate, and her right as a member to participate in the endowment fund, etc., are but inducements to the contract upon which she counts, and do not render the complaint ambiguous, uncertain, or unintelligible. That most, if not all, of this matter, is redundant, and might have been stricken out as such, under section 453, Code Civil Proc., is highly probable, but is not a cause for demurrer.

The other objections are without merit. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.
